The true Holy Grail is the light of God that burns in the soul and before the vision of every consecrated believer in Jesus. Our souls may have the touch of light and glory—the same glory which blazed in the Temple before the wondering eyes of Isaiah, that held the gaze of Ezekiel at the river side, that rested on the brows of the disciples on the Day of Pentecost, that smote to the ground the persecutor Saul on the Damascus road. To possess this sacred, pure fire of devotion, to follow this "anointing" which the Apostle John declares is the Christian's true guide, to dwell in the atmosphere of love for God, to know that in his presence there is even now fulness of joy—this is what the dreamers of the past meant by seeing and following the Holy Grail. And for the living of this life we need not the help of any perishable symbol that needs to be put into a vacuum lest it vanish away. The true presence of God can be felt amid life's busiest activities. It does not fade or perish from any individual life that is faithful, but the flame of the divine life is passed on from one soul to another and from one generation to the next. We can grow accustomed to living in and with that presence here, so that when death overtakes us we shall find ourselves comfortable and at home in the atmosphere of heaven.

The Treasure-Ship

FORTY-FIVE tons of gold—said to be the largest specie shipment ever known—reached New York from England on August 11. Its value was $20,000,000 and along with it came $21,000,000 in gilt-edged securities. But while the securities made only a medium-sized package, the gold filled seven hundred strong boxes, and was transported from England to Halifax and thence to New York. This vast shipment of gold was considered so precious that the steamship carrying it was guarded by a flotilla of torpedo-boat destroyers, the whole being under the command of a distinguished British admiral. The gold reached New York from the Nova Scotian port in a train of steel railway cars, with a pilot engine running ahead to look out for bombthrowers. It was received by a detachment of seventy-five armed guards who, with a platoon of mounted police, escorted it to the Sub-Treasury in New York.

This immense consignment of gold is designed, among other things, to liquidate part of Europe's indebtedness to America for war munitions. American factories have been running night and day for months past, turning out many millions of worth of their death-dealing product. Factory have figured up their abnormal profits; factory owners have smiled with satisfaction as their cargo shipped with record time rapidity; the factory workers have toiled as they never toiled before, knowing that there was "big money" in it for them, too. And in Wall Street, the holders of munition "stocks"—"war babies" they now call them—watch the rising prices and think of their comfortable dividends, some of which no doubt will come out of this shipment of gold.

There are many apologists for this munitions traffic—interested defenders, most of them. They defend it chiefly because to stop the traffic would be to shut off their profits. They defend it as justified by international law and usage. They overlook the fact that legality and morality are by no means interchangeable terms.

We affirm that it is absolutely impossible for a nation to justify the munitions traffic on moral grounds or on the basis of humanity.

This is what President Wilson himself wrote the subject in his message to Congress two years ago, dealing with Mexico: "I shall follow the best practice of nations in the matter of neutrality by forbidding the exportation of arms and munitions of war of any kind from the United States—a policy suggested by several interesting precedents, and certainly dictated by many manifest considerations of practical expediency."

Religion, humanity and justice all demand the cessation of this inglorious and shameful business. The great body of the American people is fair-minded and just and would rejoice to know that the President had decided to carry out his own interpretation, already quoted, since what was good morals and good citizenship two years ago can be no less so today. He cannot mistake the positive sentiment of the American people that this nation should not only keep out of the war itself, as long as it can do so without aggravating its results.

"Blessed are the peacemakers," can never be used by the munition traffickers, nor of any nation that sacrifices its own dignity by permitting the murderous trade to flourish within its borders.

Methodists Mobilize

A QUARTER of a million net gain in membership; a half million church members enlisted in the Time Legion, a group of workers pledged to give a specific amount of time month to month to the direct work of soul-winning; one thousand people pledged to the life of definite Christian service—that is the goal set by the Methodists as they take up their Forward Movement for the year ending May 1, 1916. The Methodist Commission on Evangelism in outlining this plan calls for at least one thousand centers of co-operation. The centers will be organized by the local pastor or pastors. "The primary plan is that every District Superintendent have the most daring and definite evangelistic program he is able to construct for his district as a standard of evangelistic efficiency; that every pastor in Methodism present to his Quarterly Conference for immediate adoption a constructive, comprehensive evangelistic program for the whole year, and with the co-operation of the Quarterly Conference bend every energy of the church toward its success."

Bishop Theodore S. Henderson, head of the Commission on Evangelism, will be the leader of the great Forward Movement. From his residence at Chattanooga, Tennessee, he will be in communication with every District Superintendent who will co-operate in this great evangelistic crusade, while he will devote much time to personal tours of leadership and counsel.

System and definiteness can be applied to spiritual work as well as to material and secular work. Organization will not take the place of inspiration; but inspiration without organization is apt to be ineffective. There is good hope that this ecumenical, which has so long stood for an aggressive, hearty evangelism, will reap great returns for God from this well-planned Forward Movement upon which she enters. Other denominations have more or less definite evangelistic campaigns under way, and Christian Herald reader will be kept informed as to these plans and their progress, and urged to give their denominational leaders their vigorous support. The heart-felt prayer of every true believer in Jesus is that this new plan for rekindling and spreading the fires of old-time Methodism will be accompanied by abundant divine blessing and meet with unprecedented victory.

Dog Perishes Saving Girl

DON, a Scotch collie, owned by John Miller of Caldwell, New Jersey, gave up his life the other day to save the little daughter of his master from attack by a copperhead. The dog killed the snake and died several hours after of poison inflicted by bites. Agnes Miller, six years old, and Clara, her elder sister, were playing with Don in the woods near home, when Agnes ran up close to a copperhead snake, which coiled to strike her. She did not see the reptile, but Don did and pounced upon it and tore it to pieces; but not until the snake had emptied its poison fangs into his body. No one who has never owned a collie can understand fully the intelligence, the sympathy, the loyalty of the noble creature. No one who has not ad a collie with his babies would ever dream of the care this dog has for the children, and the sense of responsibility he shows in his eagerness for their protection. It took ten years of breeding to make a creature like him, with the intelligence, the courage, the loyalty, and loyalty to take the place of a man in caring for his flock. There is not a full-blooded collie that would not freely give up his life in defending a child or a sheep. Don was only true to himself and the tradition of his breed when he killed the snake. He knew that he was trying to save his little Agnes, though he knew that he was losing his own life in doing so. The collie has many imitators who love and care for children, and who are willing to suffer and die to save others. Don's love for the child and his saving of her life is a heroic death suggests the greatest thought of God—the one cherished deepest in the divine heart—the salvation of his children from the bite of the serpent of sin, at the cost of the life of his only Son. Christ thus expresses this greatest, sweetest thought in the universe: "I am the good Shepherd: the good Shepherd giveth his life for the sheep." (John 10: 11.)

New Antiseptic

ABLEGRAM from Paris, dated August 5, announces that Dr. Alexis Carl of the Rockefeller Institute and Dr. Henry D. Dakin of the Lister Institute have discovered, after exhaustive experiments at the Coniégne Military Hospital, what they say is an ideal antiseptic. The most powerful antiseptic known to science is hypochloride of lime, but its use is injurious to the tissues, owing to its acidity, and it does not keep. Drs. Dakin and Carrel have found that these two defects are remedied respectively by the addition of carbonate of lime and boric acid. Professor Landowzy has explained the new antiseptic to the Academy of Sciences, the members of which say the discovery will be of great importance in surgery. God, in the marvelous discoveries of medical and surgical science, is manifesting his merciful and curative powers, "and healeth the stroke of their wound." (Isa. 30: 26.)

Disaster Threatens Palestine Fields

FORTUNATELY most of the fruits of the world are enjoying bountiful harvests during this year, when, of all others, they are the most needed. Unfortunately, Palestine is suffering in her field from drought, insects and other causes. Mr. George Kiat, general commissioner of commerce, with headquarters at Jaffa, in his report just published, says that the fruit-growers of Palestine will lose $30,000,000 this year in the crop failure. The commissioner's discouraging letter says "Our trees are dying for want of watering and for want of petroleum to spray them. The absence of the protecting spray has brought more disaster. We have been visited with a plague of locusts, and trees and vegetation are ruined. Unless something is done, and done quickly, we face famine and starvation." Despite the waste of war, there is money enough left to feed the starving of Palestine and the world, and, thank God, there is the disposition also to do so. One of the earliest records of sacred history is this mention of a famine in Canaan: "And there was a famine in the land: and Abram went down into Egypt to sojourn there; for the famine was grievous in the land." (Gen. 12: 10.)

Six Million Miles Afloat

SIX million miles or more on the Atlantic highway without shipwreck is the record of Howard Ernest Hinsley, purser of the American liner St.

service lines. The first day's vegetables went to the two summer camps of the United Charities. Those which came to the Northwestern Station were given to the families of the city's congested neighborhoods which have been taken to Algonquin Camp, and to the Hospital for Convalescent Women and Children. The other load of vegetables went to the Hallowarden Camp near Joliet. Other garden days followed and the United Charities Committee superintended the local distribution of their free vegetables. Vegetables, so healthful at all times, are especially so in the summer. This is a beautiful charity. What would we do without the goodness and affection of the people who live in the country? The sweet messages of love from the children and grown people pinned to the baskets, the bouquets of old-fashioned country flowers that decorated them and the vegetables that filled them, all preached eloquently from this text: "Laboring ye ought to support the weak, and to remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said, It is more blessed to give than to receive." (Acts 20: 35.)

Presbyterian Gain

ACCORDING to a report just published, the Presbyterian Church in the United States has broken all records in members and in money. The growth in membership for the past year was 54,961, pushing up the communicants to 1,513,046. Within ten years the Presbyterian Church in the United States has added very nearly a half million to its membership, and 350,000 to its Sunday school rolls. The number of ministers in the church is 9,670, the highest number yet attained. These figures do not include the Presbyterians of the South. The benevolences for the year have also been record-breaking. The total gifts amount to $27,784,000, an average of $18.32 per member. Home mission gifts amounted to about $2,000,000 and foreign missions received $1,810,000. The report places the Fifth Avenue Church, New York, as the largest Presbyterian Church of the world, with last year the best of its history. Its charities amounted to $403,500. Its cost of maintenance was about $100,000. It gave to foreign missions $42,000, and to home missions $54,000. Other Christians will rejoice at the year's success of this denomination, which has done so much to bless the world and usher in the Master's kingdom, in answer to his prayer: "Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven." (Matt. 6: 10.)

Drowns Saving His Warship

IN the fashionable neighborhood of Riverside Drive, a little boy from the upper East Side, New York, was sailing some toy boats on the Hudson which he called his "warships." The wash of a steamboat was taking them away, and, in attempting to rescue them, he was drowned. The tragedy should never have been. What business had a boy, only six years old, more than a mile from his home in a city of four million, playing without a protector about the Hudson, whose treacherous sea-tides, steep banks, and deep water have claimed so many victims? There is too little old-fashioned home care and training nowadays, among the poor and the rich as well. The children are given over to the day school, the Sunday school, the settlement, the society, but the old family care of one or two generations ago is so often lacking. It is a pity, for this home training is the first essential, the basis of the rest. The parents of America will do well to heed this injunction: "Train up a child in the way he should go." (Prov. 22: 6.)

Chicago's First Garden Day

CHICAGO had its first Garden Day recently, in the interest of the residents who are too poor to buy fresh vegetables. Message-laden, flower-bedecked, overflowing baskets of suburban vegetables poured into the city over the various suburban

Y. W. C. A. AT PANAMA EXPOSITION

A HEADQUARTERS of religious activity in the San Francisco Exposition is the Young Women's Christian Association Building, erected by the National Board. Each Sunday morning there is a short service for the hundred or more employees of the building, who stand and serve the thousands of guests in the cafeteria and elsewhere. In the afternoon, a choir is sent to aid one of the chaplains in his service on some man-of-war stationed in the harbor. At five the silver trumpet calls an audience to the vesper service on the portico, which is usually attended by hundreds of people. During the supper hour familiar hymns are played. On the moving-picture screen in the assembly room are shown scenes of Christian missionary conquest in America and foreign lands. On week days the assembly room at the main building is used for entertaining convention officers at luncheon. The Baptist Young People's Union of America, the Epworth League Special Conference, the International Family Congress, the American Library Association, the American Nurses' Association are among the many gatherings of this kind. Young women occupied in the exhibition palaces come for supper and social evenings. Lectures and reunions of all kinds are held here. Two secretaries give their whole time to securing employment for cashiers, demonstrators and others who may happen to be out of work. The beautiful Y. W. C. A. building at the exposition, with its equipment and service for the social and spiritual welfare of the young women visitors, is a fitting expression of the great organization behind it that is doing so much to answer this prayer of the psalmist: "That our daughters may be as cornerstones, polished after the similitude of a pious man." (Ps. 144: 12.)

Louis. Having reached the age of sixty he gave notice, on the last trip of the vessel, of his determination to retire from the sea. He claims the record of having crossed the Atlantic 2,000 times. His first call to the deep was in 1867 as a mate's boy on the City of Baltimore. A year later, he went to the City of Antwerp and afterwards for two years he was with the navy. He was a purser on the American Line for twenty-three years. Mr. Hinsley has a little farm up near Dumfries, Scotland, and expects to end his days there. Aside from his official duties, the veteran navigator had a good opportunity to learn in the school of nature and touch Omnipotence in the deep, blue, shoreless sea: "They that go down to the sea in ships, that do business in great waters; these see the works of the Lord, and his wonders in the deep." (Ps. 107: 23, 24.)

40 Horsepower 7-Passenger Touring Car, Weight 3075 lbs.

Valve-in-Head Motor with Overhead Camshaft

THE battle of the giants is on. It is a battle royal for the supremacy of the medium priced motor car field.

It is the battle of that type of motor which smashed all speed and endurance records at Indianapolis and Chicago—against old style motors.

It is the battle of the principles of construction that went 90 miles an hour for 500 miles at Indianapolis, and 100 miles an hour for 500 miles at Chicago—against out-dated principles of motor construction.

It is the battle of the manufacturer against the middleman, the producer against the assembler, of buying for cash against buying on time, of new efficiency in methods of manufacture and administration against inexperienced methods.

It is the battle of Quality and lower profits against higher profits and lack of quality.

It is the battle of new service ideals and co-operation against old methods of expensive upkeep and neglect of the owner.

Into this contest the Chalmers Motor Company enters the greatest car it has ever built, the Chalmers

Six with valve-in-head overhead camshaft motor.

It is the lowest price at which Chalmers Quality has ever been sold—$1350 for a big 7-passenger touring car.

It is a new car at a lower price sent to battle with old cars at cut prices.

With new service to owners, bigger plans, bigger output, new buildings, increased factory facilities and quadrupled production the Chalmers Motor Company moves forward to the great battle with supreme confidence.

First Quality Car at $1350

New Motor New Car New Price New Service to Owners Increased Factory Facilities—Quadrupled Production for 1916

TWO years ago we saw three things. First was that the tendency of the public demand in both Europe and America was to a compact high speed motor that was more efficient, would get away quicker, run more smoothly, have greater flexibility, show greater economy and last longer under hard service.

Second was that a public temporarily diverted to cars that looked well and rode nicely for a while, would swing back to demand quality manufacture and the ability to "stay put."

Third was that only those manufacturers who built their own cars in large volume and bought their own materials for spot cash at the advantage of the market could survive.

Motor Designed in Europe

So we sent our engineers to Europe to design a new motor and began to lay our plans for a production of 20,000 cars this season.

Twenty thousand cars! Nearly four times as many as the Chalmers factory ever turned out before! We are now building two big new factory additions to handle the work. We added machines that cost $72,000.00 apiece to do work in our factory in order to give this remarkable quality car to you at $1350.

Here is the result.

No one dreamed that such a car could be built for $1350. It is equal to cars that sold for $4000 three years ago. It isn't a made-over model, reduced in size, or certain things eliminated to fit the price—it is a brand new car, designed specially as a Quality car at a low price.

New Service to Owners

Buying a motor car without a definite guarantee of service is unwise and costly.

Every Chalmers dealer gives to every buyer of a Chalmers car a definite service free of all charge.

The Quality Car at Small Profit

We are marketing this QUALITY car on the lowest profit per car in the motor car business.

The great valve-in-head motor, with overhead camshaft, costs us $80.00 more to build in our own shops, than the ordinary type of motor can be bought for on the outside, and most of the competitors in our price class are using the ordinary type of motor.

When Chalmers engineers went to Europe to study design two years ago, they found European designers at work on high speed motors of the valve-in-head type with overhead camshaft.

European makers had already tried this type out in their racers. They were perfecting it for a road car.

We hoped to be the first in America to adopt this style of motor. But when the war stopped European makers—fate decreed that we should lead the world in the use of the valve-in-head overhead camshaft motor for a stock car.

Speedway Racers All of This Type

We were not surprised at the showing at Indianapolis and Chicago, where this type of motor won all honors. We knew a year ago that these results would be achieved. We knew that to attain a speed of 90 to 100 miles an hour that the motor would have to be a valve-in-head, overhead camshaft type.

Think of it! 90 miles an hour for 500 miles at Indianapolis and eight of the first ten to finish were valve-in-head motors with overhead camshafts!

And then the Chicago races at 100 miles an hour for 500 miles—the first three and seven out of the first eleven were of this type!

Some one said a short time ago that people buy motor cars largely on three P's—Paint, Price and Performance. You can measure this Chalmers wonderful car, at $1350, by any one of these three standards.

It is right in Paint, which indicates finish and wearing qualities.

It is right in Performance, because no car at any price, performs better than this car does.

And it is right in Price. No one in the history of the industry ever approached such quality at such a price before.

Take a Ride in This Car

"Take a ride in this car," and see for yourself if you do not get in this Chalmers type of six-cylinder motor all the smoothness, all of the flexibility, all of the pick-up, and all of the "pep" that is claimed for any other motor built, no matter how many cylinders it may have.

Therefore, we say that all of our strength, all of our organization, all of our money, all of our reputation, are back of these six words: "TAKE A RIDE IN THIS CAR."

Demonstrators are now in the hands of our dealers.

"TAKE A RIDE IN THIS CAR."

All the Way 'Round the Clock How Mrs. Up-to-date makes the trip

On washday instead of getting up at 5 o'clock, as she used to do, she lies in bed till 6—just like other mornings.

On the way downstairs she carries the clothes-basket. It's pretty full too—there are five in the family. But Mrs. Up-to-date doesn't worry.

After breakfast she sorts the clothes, wets them, soaps them well with Fels-Naptha, rolls each piece and leaves them to soak for 30 minutes. You see it's just eight-o'clock.

She makes the beds and dusts, while Fels-Naptha Soap does the hard part of the washing—loosens and dissolves the dirt and grease. She's ready to do her part by 8.30.

From 8.30 to 10.30 she washes. It's easy work, because there's no hard-rubbing to do—Fels-Naptha has made that unnecessary. By 11.30 every piece is washed, blued, rinsed and ready for the line.

Six o'clock again! Mrs. Up-to-date has had a rest—she has sprinkled down the clothes for tomorrow's ironing. She is feeling fresh and fine—ready to get a good supper for the family.

If she had worked through an old-fashioned washday, rub and boil, boil and rub from early morning till late afternoon, she would be worn-out and irritable.

What Fels-Naptha did for her it will do for every woman—and not only on washday, but every day, for all kinds of soap-and-water-work.

MEXICO AN INTERNATIONAL PERPLEXITY

restrict the supply of instruments of death. But, in spite of its legal neutrality, and in spite of its humanity, one objection lay against the embargo—a practical objection. Legally, formally, the embargo was neutral; but actually, and practically, it was unneutral. It was unneutral for this reason, namely: General Huerta controlled the seaports of Mexico and had a navy, a ridiculous navy, perhaps, but still a navy. Carranza held no ports, controlling only the northern Mexican states and the frontier between Mexico and the United States. Huerta could import arms and ammunition from Europe and Japan; Carranza could only hope to get his supplies from the United States.

But was it any business of ours to save Carranza from the disadvantage that he lay under by reason of Huerta's control of the sea? Perhaps not, but the President apparently concluded that it was decidedly our business to take cognizance of practical conditions. He resolved, therefore, to convert an attitude which may have been legally correct, but which was morally unjust, into an attitude which was both legally and morally, formally and practically, just. The Department of State had not then advised him that any change in American laws of neutrality during the progress of a war was unpermissible; the American Government did not then consider its power limited by any such fantastic theory as that it had to get the consent of foreign belligerents before it could alter its export laws. One notes, by the way, that the President's proclamation removing the embargo on arms and ammunition intended for Mexico was "done at the City of Washington, this third day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and fourteen, and of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and thirty-eighth." To its very last phrase this document ill comports with that sapient statesmanship which claims to discern how improper and impossible it is for a people to alter its own rules of trade without consulting the wishes of some foreign government.

The simple fact is that in February, 1914, it did not occur to anybody that "any change in our laws of neutrality during the progress of the war would be a departure from strict neutrality." It had simply come about that the Mexican embargo, imposed in the name of neutrality, was operating to an unneutral result. So it was removed. A war was in progress, but the United States had no hesitation in altering its policy toward the belligerents. The President took official notice of practical conditions and of the actual effect of our attitude. He found that it was giving one side an unjust advantage; and he reversed it, even while the war was going on.

FURTHERMORE the Government did not feel itself deterred from a reversal of attitude by the unfortunate circumstance that the change was not one dictated by the ordinary precepts of humanity. The old Mexican neutrality withheld arms from both sides; the new Mexican neutrality, having regard for actual facts, gave back arms into the hands of both. It deserves to be dwelt upon, quite candidly and particularly, that the step, which the President felt constrained to take February 3, 1914, was, from the viewpoint of humanity a backward step. It was politically dubious, ethically it was questionable, and humanely it was deplorable. It was indeed a departure from "the best practice of nations in the matter of neutrality." . . . All this might have been said, and was said, with perfect truth, against the removal of the embargo. But what was to be said in favor of the removal of the embargo? In adducing the reasons against the removal, I am not condemning, nor seeking to suggest that any one condemn, the step which the President took in February, 1914. I am pointing out how weighty must have been the consideration which in the mind of the President prevailed against the above-stated reasons.

That consideration was precisely this, namely: that Huerta controlled the sea, and Carranza, though perfectly able to purchase war supplies wherever Huerta could purchase them, was unable to get them delivered. The President of the United States took official notice of that practical fact. He did not bother his head with fine-spun subtleties drawn out to show that it would be unneutral to take a step that would help Carranza. As he saw it, probably, the point was: the United States must cease helping Huerta. The thing was working unfairly; Huerta was getting arms, and Carranza was not.

IT has now been a year and a half since the President removed the embargo on the exportation of arms to Mexico. The result of the adventure has not been gratifying. American-made bullets have sped home to the hearts of thousands of ignorant peones to whom the American people owe no revenge. Thousands have been maimed and crippled; thousands widowed and orphaned. With guns of American manufacture, even American soldiers and sailors, a few, have been slain, and more American men and women residents in Mexico have been shot down. Towns have been burned, city after city has been looted; railroads have been torn up, mines flooded, manufacturing closed down, hundreds of thousands of square miles of country devastated and depopulated.

I do not know of any advantage that has been gained. Certainly the United States has gained no advantage. Our prestige has diminished, if diminution were possible. We have won the hatred and detestation of every living Mexican who has heard the name of the United States. Our policy has not enabled any faction to seat itself in power; it has indeed increased the number of factions hopelessly fighting for control. It has perpetuated civil war and has failed to cure it.

Meanwhile, a radical change has fallen upon the situation. In this respect: The outbreak of the European war closed to Mexican purchasers the arms and ammunition markets of the world except those of the United States. During the past year the Mexican armies have been able to buy supplies only of us.

It is now, therefore, possible to shut off from Mexico the entire supply of ammunition from outside. Action by us now would force the contending Mexican armies to manufacture their own supplies or quit fighting. The imposition of a renewed embargo would put us again on the higher plane of morality from which the President deemed it necessary to descend. It would put the United States Government again in line "with the best practice of nations in the matter of neutrality." It would cleanse our hands of the bloody business.

For, assuredly, a peculiar responsibility rests upon a nation whose people alone of all the people in the world are selling to foreigners weapons with which to keep up a cruel war. It must be the verdict alike of common sense and of the best precepts of the international conscience, that, if nations will fight, they ought to fight with their own weapons—that it is precisely as dishonorable to sell guns as it is to sell soldiers to other nations at war. Today, indeed, wars are contests between machine-shops as much as between armies. Is it not as disgraceful to hire out machines and shops and workmen as it would be to hire out soldiers? Are not the mechanics whom Mr. Schwab mobilizes for the services of whoever will pay for them just as truly "mercenaries" as the Hessians whom the Landgrave

Frederick II let to the English George III to help overthrow Washington?

But the responsibility for the blood shed in Mexico lies in a very special manner upon the United States because of the fact that today we alone are able to supply, and are supplying, the contending Mexican armies with tools of death.

BUT has not an American citizen a right to sell arms? Yes, he has, just as a saloon-keeper has a right to sell whisky or a druggist has a right to sell carbolic acid—just so long as the people allow him to and subject to the humane limitations which the people may see fit to impose. The trade in deadly weapons is one that is tolerated on sufferance and under regulation at home, while, as for its extension abroad, a cargo of arms is an outlaw the minute it is afloat on the high seas. In all the entertaining history of international law there probably never was concocted a more grotesque theory than that foreign nations would have a right to be offended if we, for one reason or another or for no reason at all, concluded to stop the shipping of guns and ammunition from our ports.

Of course to lay an embargo now, while war is going on in Mexico, would be out of line with the argument, recently advanced by the Department of State, that it would be unneutral to change our customs regulations while war is going on. But this precious bit of special pleading was invented, as everybody knows, to justify us in supplying the British Allies with shrapnel with which to kill Germans, and nobody will insist upon its equal applicability to the Mexican situation. It will be perfectly easy to say that there is a great difference between an international war and a civil war—and so there is; though nobody will see clearly what that has to do with the right to withhold weapons from belligerents, it will pass as a sage and satisfactory answer. And if any one should suggest that a German's life is worth as much as a "Greaser's" life, it will be perfectly easy to fall back upon our old friend the Monroe Doctrine.

But whom would the renewal of the Mexican embargo aid? To what faction would it render assistance?

I do not know. I do not care. I do not believe that anybody should care. Between Carranza and Villa, without any special affection for either, I confess I favor Carranza, just as between Germany and England many Americans favor England. But I do not believe that this consideration enters into the matter at all. If the people of the United States desire Villa or Carranza or perhaps Felipe Angeles to win over his rivals, we should not content ourselves with shipping him munitions of war under the pretense of neutrality; we should go in openly, espouse his cause, take the risk and invite the dangers of such an espousal. Nothing is so detestable as to sneak to one side in a fight help against the other side, whom we lack the nerve to meet openly in arms.

HOWEVER, if arguments such as the above fail, if in the wisdom of the Administration an embargo is out of the question, there is one thing nevertheless that can be done, following one of the most beautiful precedents in our country's history. Let the President repeat, this time with special application to the sad case of Mexico, his proclamation of a day of prayer for peace. Let him exhort the people of the United States to assemble in their accustomed places of worship and beseech the throne of heavenly grace to do what we have no intention of helping to do ourselves. Let the President instruct us that, in our deep solicitude, in our earnest longing for the cessation of deadly strife, we should watch and wait, hope and pray—and sell all the goods we can in the meantime; constrained by the spirit of perfect neutrality, sending simultaneously our supplications to God and our shrapnel to Pancho Villa.

What Magic Lies in Oats?

On that point Science disagrees.

Some say they develop the thyroid gland, and thus foster growth. Some say they ward off age. And each claim is supported by countless experiments.

What we know is that oats form a marvelous vim-food. They are batteries of energy. Their spirit-giving power is proverbial. To "feel one's oats" signifies vitality. We admire the oat-fed Scotch.

And we know that Nature endows oats with delights—with a luscious flavor, an enticing aroma. And that Nature had some lofty object in making oats so inviting.

Oakland

Model "38"

High-Speed Motor

Means More Explosions, More Revolutions, More Power, Less Fuel

THE big, dominating feature of this Oakland "38" is its high-speed motor. "High-Speed Motor" applies entirely to the motor and not to the speed of the car. Light, quick power pulses that melt into a continuous flow—eliminate vibration and give you a store of power on tap for any speed of the car—creep at three miles an hour or go the limit. Quick "getaways"—hills, mud or sand—steady road running.

Instead of the explosion of terrific, racking force, as in ordinary four-cylinder motors, there are many more power impulses of less violence with no pause between—hence no vibration. Greater velocity of flywheel balances power and reduces car strain. Minimum fuel consumption.

Four cylinders of a minimum number of parts—light weight—low upkeep.

This type of motor is standard equipment with the best European builders. It costs more to build. Each part is lighter and stronger.

The high-speed four-cylinder motor won all the money on the Indianapolis and Chicago Speedways.

Oakland standards of uncompromising quality. Delco electric starting, lighting and ignition; Oakland-Stewart vacuum gasoline feed. Lots of room for five passengers.

The Oakland line is complete. Your dealer is now demonstrating this Model "38" and the new light six. Very shortly we will announce another master of its class, to be a large seven-passenger touring car

ELIJAH AND THE PROPHETS OF BAAL

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR SEPTEMBER

I KINGS 18: 16-40

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"Jehovah is far from the wicked, but he heareth the prayer of the righteous." Prov. 15:

It is a great sight to see Elijah there prostrate on the ground, commanding the clouds of heaven, through faith in the living God. James says of him, that he was a man of like passions with us, but he turned his passion into his prayer and prayed earnestly. He goes on to say that the prayer of a righteous man avails much in its working. But cannot all at once plunge into praying like that. Prayer is a science and art in which gradually become mighty. A child may pray efficiently, and the simplest faith will obtain great answers, but there are blessings to be obtained by the Elijahs and Daniels, the Pauls and Müllers, the Moodys and Spurgeons, which await the holy violence that takes kingdom of heaven by force. The way to acquire that power is by yielding to the prompting, however slight, of the Holy Spirit. Whenever he says, "Seek ye my face," sure to answer, "Thy face, Lord, will I seek." Do not postpone obedience. Brown North tells us that the servant was blacking the grate when the first direct impulse of prayer came on him. He says that he was so afraid to lose the effect of this gracious prompting that, much to the girl's astonishment, he fell on his knees and began to pray aloud. Every time you yield thus, it will get easier.

The Secret of Power

By Amos R. Wells

ART thou he that troubleth Israel?" This angry question, asked Elijah by King Ahab, is asked soon or late of every man who tries to reform any evil. True, reform is a trouble. Reformers do "turn the world upside down," but it is because the world has been wrong side up.

Elijah was right in claiming a God who would answer by fire. Evelyn Underhill has a lovely little poem, "Immanence," in which she pictures a mother bird brooding eggs in her nest, and hears Deity saying, "There doth my Godhead rest." Both are true. God is in the still, small voice, as Elijah found later, as truly as in the fire; but he is in the fire, in majesty and power, and men need to reverence and fear him as well as to love and trust him.

The Old Testament description of idols is a word meaning "emptiness." It is well illustrated by the graphic sentence in our story, "There was neither voice nor any to answer, nor any that regarded." The Baal-worshippers were flinging out their prayers upon emptiness. "A man's god," wrote Robertson, "is that which has his whole soul and worship." How many men today have no better gods than Baal—gold, fame, power, pleasure, emptiness—all with no voice, no ears, no eyes!

Elijah did well to dash the water upon his sacrifice, to heap his test with impossibilities, that thereby he might make his proof convincing, overpowering. When men test a bridge over which cars are to pass, they do not load it with a single train, but with train upon train, all the cars the bridge will hold, on both tracks and all tracks. The margin of safety is to be beyond all possible need where human life is concerned. God exults in tests that are equally severe. "Prove me now," he urges all his children.

The scene on Carmel is a great lesson in confident prayer. The priests of Baal thought they would be heard for their much speaking—and acting. They screamed, leaped, cut themselves. Elijah's prayer was quiet, earnest, trustful. Such is the prayer of every experienced Christian. An example comes to us from the life of Judson, who had always entertained a strong desire to work for the Jews, but had been prevented. In his last illness, however, he learned that a little book about him in Germany had led to the conversion of some Jews, and a goodly work among them had grown from it. Tears filling his eyes, Judson testified, "I have never prayed earnestly for anything but at some time, no matter how distant, and somehow, probably in the last shape I should have devised, it came."

That is what draws men to Christ. When Chang Po Ling, the wonderful Christian college president, the Arnold of North China, first went to learn about Christ, he said, "I notice that you Christians seem to have some hidden source of joy and peace and power. What is the secret of this power? Elijah knew the secret, and so may we.

The Triumph of Truth

By Arthur H. Howland

THAT is a startling word of Elijah: "If Baal be God, follow him." How could he dare take such a risk? How could he seem even for a moment to acknowledge that there might be some reality and power about Baal? How could he say, even in this spiritual argument and on an impossible condition, "Follow Baal?"

A man who knows he has and the truth is not afraid of any arguments and proofs his opponent can bring forth. Truth triumphs in every position. Elijah was not the least bit afraid of Baal. He knew that if anything went wrong with his test it would go hard with him. He was not afraid of anything that Baal might do to him nor afraid that any other would be led astray by his exhortation to follow Baal if he could prove his existence and power. Baal was nothing: his God was every man. They might put him to any test. Jehovah would triumph.

This is a pleasant picture—Elijah repairing the altar of the Lord that was broken down. See him being to pick up the scattered stones and setting them, one by one, in place. Here is the place to begin any reformation—at the place of prayer. Has our experience faded, our spiritual power been broken? Here the place to begin to get right a to make good—at the place of prayer. Prayer in secret, prayer in the prayer in the church circle. The life of power is the life of prayer. Build down and rebuild the altar of prayer. Begin again to talk intimately with God.

"Let it be known this day that there is a God in Israel, and that I am thy servant." Are we anxious to have people know that our God lives and reigns? Are we eager and proud to have it known that we are his servants? There is coming a time when his name shall be upon our forehead. Is it known now by our courage, our honesty, our kindness, our spirituality, that we are his?

"Hear me . . . that this people may know that thou art the Lord." There is the right touch of altruism in our usual ambition. Simply to be a saint, simply to have power in prayer, simply to get spiritual blessings of glory—this is not the true motive. Bless me, Lord, and make me a blessing. That is the right note. "Hear me—that this people may know." We think of the reverse side of this. If God does not hear us, if God does not bless us, then the people who might have known him, who might have found him, may never reach him.

"Then the fire of the Lord fell. A study of fire as the sign of God is most interesting. We are now worshippers, but the God we worship has often manifested himself in the appearance of fire. Abraham at the evening sacrifice, Moses at the burning bush, Solomon at the temple, Isaiah in the temple, Ezekiel at the riverside, the Christians at Pentecost—these and countless others since Pentecost have had experiences which have helped them to understand the meaning of the strange words in Deuteronomy and Hebrews: "Our God is a consuming fire."

When persons are touched by fire they know it; and others know it. That is the one supreme need of the church and all religious organizations today—the fire of God. Not only in the distant past was God a consuming fire. He was a fire in the heart of Luther, in the heart of Wesley, in the heart of Finney. He was a fire in the heart of Sherwood Eddy in China last summer. He will be, this month, this week, this day, a fire in the heart and life of any believer who will welcome the Pentecostal gift and submit all that he has and is to the divine burning. It is pitiful to see the efforts of formal Christians, formal ministers, formal leaders, trying to do without fire the work that only fire can do. Dr. Torrey tells about the time that he went into his study, while pastor of a large Congregational church, and upon his knees declared that he would never preach again until he had received the baptism with the Holy Spirit and knew it. The vision of a leaderless church, a waiting congregation, did not terrorize or dissuade him. He had come to the place of Peniel, where like Jacob he sent all his belongings and his followers away, and knelt alone with God. "Then the fire of the Lord fell" and four continents have heard the Gospel from his fire-touched lips.

From fire to rain. "There is the sound of abundance of rain," said Elijah. The figures of fire and water as representing spiritual life run through the Scripture. Fire means cleansing and power. Water means cleansing and gladness and fruitfulness. Fire at the altar means showers of blessing far and wide.

Echoes from the Holy Land

ELIJAH met Ahab somewhere between Zarephath and Samaria. Zarephath was a cape or promontory on the Mediterranean Sea about half way between Sidon and Tyre, which are about twenty miles apart. Samaria, built by Ahab's father, only six miles away from Shechem (Jeroboam's old capital), was a beautiful round isolated hill rising 200 feet above the plain, around the top of which the new city was built like a crown. The situation could not be surpassed in all Syria for quiet beauty or fertile surroundings, nor equaled for purposes of commerce and defense. Jezebel, Ahab's wife from Tyre, transformed it into a center of abominable idolatry swarming with lazy and dissolute priests who feared and hated Elijah the Tishbite, the man with a message from God.

The ruins of Samaria are now a perfect fountain of stones which have been poured down the surrounding slopes of the hill, from which rise hundreds of the stumps of columns marking the lines of ancient streets and colonnades. A new carriage road crosses the southern slope and a railroad almost encircles it, both leading from the plain of Esdraelon to Shechem. An American Exploration Society has actually bought the hill and has been making excavations which promise most interesting and valuable results. The foundation of what seems to have been Ahab's palace has been laid bare along with many later structures.

Obadiah hid "one hundred of the Lord's prophets in a cave." On the west end of Carmel, below the monastery, is a large cavern, partly artificial, where to increase its sanctity the Holy Family are said to have rested on their return from Egypt. The "Place of Sacrifice" is some eight miles inland along the crest of the mountain, overlooking the Kishon, the whole plain of Esdraelon, Jezreel and the mountains of Galilee. Many churches and nationalities, not to mention individuals, have searched the slopes of Carmel for the exact spot where Elijah "repaired the altar of the Lord," selecting twelve stones from the ruins of the neglected altar. At the urgent request of an English lady, who thought of purchasing the site, I once made a careful study of the location suggested. While we may never know the exact spot, there is a lovely little plateau not far from the summit which would fulfill every necessity of the narrative and provide a matchless natural theater for this matchless event in history.

This department is maintained for the benefit of our regular readers; the service is offered entirely free of cost to them, and all correspondence is strictly personal and confidential in so far as the identity of the inquirer is concerned. Always enclose letter postage a write name and address plainly, addressing your inquiry to Financial Editor, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York City.

Neither the Christian Herald nor any other publication can guarantee the value of investment securities. We do all we can, however, to make sure of the integrity of our advertising before admitting them to our columns. Any advice given is an expression of our conclusion based upon information we believe to be reliable; but we must not be held responsible should any loss arise from its acceptance.

ANSWERS TO FINANCIAL QUERIES

J. D. R., BRITISH COLUMBIA. Brokers to whom we have referred the matter of the Fox Optical stock say "no value." This was one of the W. M. Ostrander promotions.

J. E. M., Oklahoma. We cannot report on the small fraternal life insurance companies. Such schemes are usually hazardous. Insurance in regular old-line companies is to be preferred to assessment protection.

MISS L. J., NEBRASKA. Congress failed to pass the "rider" to the Rural Credits Bill, nor was the bill itself put through. Had it been made a law the farmer would have been permitted to borrow money from the government at exceedingly reasonable rate of interest. The next Congress is likely to take up the matter of rural credits.

B. O. B., GEORGIA. Car Light and Power Co. stock at $10.75 is very speculative. Don't go off on sidetracks for your investments. Stick to the main line. Confine your expenditure of investment money to tested securities. If you want 6 per cent. for your money buy good railroad stock such as Atchison or Union Pacific or Pennsylvania, or buy good public utility notes that pay 6 per cent.

DR. W. H., PENNSYLVANIA. The New York Clearing House is a place where the representatives of all the member banks who hold checks and other demands upon each other meet and exchange those demands, squaring the transaction by paying or receiving any balance due from one to the other, thus obviating the necessity of the representatives of each bank calling daily upon all the other banks of the city. The Clearing House exchanges amount in a single year to nearly two trillion dollars.

MRS. W. O. J., CALIFORNIA. In our opinion there is no form of speculative investment so extraordinarily hazardous as buying mining stock. Even with the dividend-paying companies the risk is always present. One never knows what minute dividends will stop. With a mining company that does not pay dividends the situation is infinitely more hazardous. We never recommend mining stock investments to our readers—indeed, we always do whatever we can to keep them from buying this class of security.

E. McK., NEW JERSEY. (1) Hold on to your Adams Express stock. When railway stocks commence a sustained upward movement all the express stocks are likely to follow. You can then get out with smaller loss. (2) The partial payment method of acquiring ownership of investment stocks and bonds has enabled thousands to become the owners of securities who, otherwise, would never have been able to buy them. Become acquainted with this method. Write the partial payment firms for their literature.

MRS. T. J., PENNSYLVANIA. (1) Chisholm, Topeka & Santa Fe preferred stock has preference as to assets and non-cumulative dividends not exceeding 5 per cent. per annum. The common stock is entitled to all earnings above the fixed charges, including the dividends on the preferred. The preferred stock receives 1 1/4 per cent. quarterly, and the common stock receives 1 1/2 per cent. quarterly. The preferred has received dividends regularly since 1899. The common has received dividends since 1901, when 3 1/2 per cent. was paid. From then to 1905 4 per cent. was paid. Then for eight years the dividends ranged between 5 and 6 per cent. and the 6 per cent. rate was definitely established in 1910. Both stocks are regarded as excellent investments. (2) The Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul 5 per cent. convertible bonds are regarded as an excellent investment security of a slightly speculative nature. We should have no hesitancy in giving approval to a purchase of such bonds for a woman's investment.

W. O. A., MARYLAND. You state that you have approximately $10,000 to invest. In our opinion the most attractive investments today are high-class railroad bonds. Such issues are now selling at almost the lowest price in a decade. Many competent bond men have expressed belief that lowest levels have been reached. We suggest one each of the following issues:

Lake Shore 4s (1928) at	94 1/2
Northern Pacific 4s at	90 3/4
Pennsylvania 4s (1949) at	97 3/4
Southern Railway 5s at	98 3/4
West Shore 4s at	89
Lehigh Valley Con. 4 1/2s at	98 1/2
Central Pacific First 4s at	95 1/2
Chesapeake & Ohio General 4 1/2s at	72 1/2
Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Gen. 4s at	91 1/4
C., B. & Q. General 4s at	90

Or you might select one each of any of the above bonds and then add five different lots of ten shares each of good railroad stock such as Atchison, Pennsylvania, Union Pacific, Norfolk & Western and Baltimore & Ohio. This would give you five $1,000 bonds and fifty shares of stock. By substituting the stock you would raise the average interest yield from about 4 1/4 per cent. to about 5 1/4 per cent.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S TOPICS FOR SEPTEMBER

Throw Yourself Into Your Task

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic.
Romans 12: 11 (Consecration Meeting)

ONE of the most grimly tragic facts of life is that so much of the world's work is done without enthusiasm and zest. It is a terrible thing to be forced to do, day after day, work that one hates. Yet a fearfully great percentage of the world's work is done by people who hate the task to which they are assigned. There is no room here to go into a study of all the causes that bring about this grievous condition.

But it is wonderful what results are accomplished when work is done with radiant and energetic enthusiasm, when one literally "throws" oneself at or into one's work. Think of that figure of speech, as though a man were a spiritual though visible giant, and picked himself up and threw himself at his work.

Above all spiritual work ought to be done like this. That word "fervent" is an intense word. It means burning, feverish. It means that we should rush at our spiritual tasks with all the ardor of a boy going out to his play.

Oh that the Holy Spirit would baptize the young people of America with this sort of zeal for his work—his work of saving and relieving and gladdening mankind! Pray for new and abundant spiritual blessing, for new fires of love, love for our Master and love for his needy world. Get a new vision of the cares and needs and sorrows of the world. Hear afresh and louder than ever its call for help. Then "throw yourself" into that work. Lose yourself in it and you will find yourself, glorified and blest at life's end, and fitted for the larger service of the other world.

Notice how often a man's work is reflected in his face, his mind, his soul. See the pining, calm, confident look in the locomotive engineer's eyes. He has lost himself in his work hour after hour alert, thinking not of himself but of his passengers and his track—and his work blesses him with skill and poise and efficiency. Any task well done reflects itself in the worker and equips him for still better work.

Even a task disliked, either in the secular or spiritual world, may come to be loved and done faithfully and persistently. Particularly in younger life is this true. In the early years one hardly knows for what work one is best fitted, and the task plainly marked should be faithfully done. Learn to work objectively, think not of self but of those who will be helped by your work. Then when life becomes settled, the task found for which we are best fitted, the work will go smoothly, swiftly, radiant efficiently, and at last all the tasks of life will be found to have been a training for the tasks of heaven.

The Standardized Car

In an impromptu brush between the Empire State Express and a Cole 8 took place on May 19, 1915, near Buffalo, N. Y. E. H. Baker, of Buffalo, who on a pleasure trip accepted the unspoken challenge of the train and won. Not satisfied with this trial he returned on June 13, prepared for a harder test. He won again. To make a living, positive record of the occurrence, he was accompanied on his second race by a moving picture operator, in another Cole 8, who photographed the two participants in action. The race will be reproduced in the leading picture theatres of the country in the near future.

Cole "Eight" Beats Out The "Empire State"

Tremendous power in the big Cole 8 gives it the speed of the wind, if you wish. But it is controlled in a flash. It is unbelievably flexible.

You may never want to drive your car at the speed of a racing train. You may not care to undertake a trip over hazardous mountain roads—but in any emergency you'll be a master of power in a Cole 8. With that power you'll have a quiet feeling of confidence, of safety.

The Cole 8 puts new joy in motoring. When you drive it at thirty-five miles an hour, you'll feel that the speed is but twenty. You'll feel a sense of restfulness that you've never felt before in a motor car. You'll skim the road without concern about mechanical details. You'll see nature with different eyes. You can enjoy mounting the difficult hills, for you'll forget their difficulties.

Cole 8 does the unusual with ease. It is the car of unusual accomplishment.

The open road will hold new charms for you in a Cole 8, for you'll ride as smoothly as a man in a boat. You'll be free from swaying, from rocking, from jolts. The Cole 8 is perfectly balanced. It hugs the road. It is light but a marvel of strength. It's as beautiful as it is strong. Without effort, it will do more than has been attempted with average cars.

Cole 8 is an achievement in automobile engineering. It is a unit of quality. It will bring you home from long distance runs ready to start all over again. You'll be refreshed and full of the joy of living. We are ready to prove its wonderful efficiency by demonstration. The Cole dealer nearest to you will be glad of an opportunity to convince you. Send for our booklet, "Why an Eight."

Cole Motor Car Company, Indianapolis, U. S. A.

There was another Cole 8, driven by W. Eaton, of Denver, Colo., who made the 320 hazardous miles from Denver to Glenwood Springs, Colo., through the heart of the Rockies, up grades as steep as 2½ per cent and ranging in altitude from 7,500 to 10,000 feet in the remarkable time of 11 hours and 50 minutes—2 hours and 10 minutes faster than the regular passenger train schedule. Less than 2 quarts of oil and 22 gallons of gasoline were used for the entire trip.

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

WE are glad to report good news from Mrs. J. A. Hardy, the Mother of the Prayer League, who writes: "When I sent my request to you about three or four weeks ago, my daughter was extremely ill. The physicians and nurse said she could not live, unless she was taken to the hospital and an operation performed; but she would not consent to that and said that she preferred to die at home, for she felt if she went to the hospital she would never return alive. So I just took her case to the Lord in earnest prayer and asked him to restore her if it was his will, and the second day afterward she got up and sat up some time, and the fourth day she was downstairs, and is still improving. The doctor and nurse were astonished at her sudden change for the better. My heart is overflowing with love and gratitude to him who is the great Physician and the Giver of all good."

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have also been received from:

Mrs. N. B., Selma, Calif.; H. M., London, England; J. E. M., Vinton, Iowa; E. L., Conrad, Iowa; Mrs. B. F. W., Glastonbury, Conn.; Mrs. S. L. G., Oakland, Ore.; Mrs. G. W. B. J., Quincy, Ill.; I. Mrs. H. W., Liberty, Mo., writes to tell us of the formation of a Prayer League in that town. She says: "We organized a Prayer League at Liberty and all the members of the Missionary Society joined. May God bless the good work!"

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at Banks, Miss. (in Union Church); South Plymouth, Mass.; Concord, N. C.; the entire state of Texas; a community in Kansas; Everest, Kans.; Menlo, Ga.; three Indian missions in the state of Washington; Danville, Ky. P. suggests prayer for special blessings upon the Prayer League; E. L. T., that this country may not be plunged into war; W. P., that the war in Europe may soon cease.

Twelve friends ask prayer for restoration or strengthening of mind for relatives, friends or themselves.

Seven friends ask prayer for the restoration or strengthening of sight for relatives, friends or themselves.

Sixteen friends ask prayer that relatives or friends be delivered from the drink habit; one, from the drug habit.

Forty-nine ask prayer for healing for themselves, including one that voice may be restored. Eleven ask prayer for healing of hearing for themselves or friends.

Thirty-five ask prayer for help or guidance in financial affairs; eighty for the granting of varied desires and needs, including one who asks prayer that her home may be happy again; another that father and mother may control their anger and be considerate and pleasant in the home; a wife, that her husband be delivered from his trouble and return home; another friend that a granddaughter may return home.

TWENTY two hundred young college men and women throughout the country spend six weeks of their summer vacation each year to teach for the Daily Vacation Bible School Association. They will have in charge approximately 80,000 children, while next year the number is expected to be well over 100,000. It is just fourteen years ago that Dr. R. G. Love, now director of the national organization, began in a humble way to put out the idea in New York City. The short time has been sufficient to demonstrate its infinite possibilities and to make it a vital force in the spiritual and social life of the nation. There is no problem so important to American Protestantism as the problem of thorough religious training in the years when mind and heart are receptive and impressionable. The Catholic Church knows the value of educating the youth in order to have the man and the woman, and is again trying to get the New York constitutional provision to obtain a division of the school fund to have state aid for its parochial schools. The predominant sentiment of the country seems to be against subsidized parochial schools as a solution for religious education. But laymen and educators alike have recognized the imperative cry that something must be done if religion and morality shall continue to be inspiration and guide for the life of the nation.

THE Daily Vacation Bible School solves the problem. The solution is simple and effective and fits naturally into the present scheme of things. There are about 400,000 college students idle for three months in the summer. The country has never had the best training not only for its own success in life, but to render its treasure of service to their less fortunate fellows on which depends the healthy growth of democracy. The Vacation Bible school presses them into service when time hangs heavy on their hands. They receive slight remuneration, but their great gain lies in their deeper appreciation of the value of life and of the importance of service.

On the other hand, idle, silent churches are thrown open to the warm efforts of spiritual ministrations. The effort that promises to extend and multiply the proper use of the earthenware vessels of stone, frequently closed from Sunday to Sunday, is brought to find heartiest commendation. The church is part of life, and its message is brought to be thrown open to the needs of life, and its progress ought to be the direction of a more intimate and continuous association with the events of life all about it. The old church was built high and prominent so that the villagers all about might see in it the center of all life and find in its lofty spire inspiration toward God. The modern church may portray this pretty bit of symbolism, but at the same time usefulness, service, helpfulness are far more than symbols. The way to the church leads through the open door of teaching, fellowship and devotion to men.

ANY of the schools are in foreign sections of our great cities. Few people realize the difficulty this country is facing civically and religiously in assimilating these vast masses of people from countries whose culture is so far removed from American ideals. The percentage of foreign born descended from foreign parents in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh and Chicago ranges from 40 to 80. However, numbers do not tell the real story. When these people arrive they drift into clannish communities, where their low standard of living is intensified and made dangerous by the unhealthy condition of the tenement. The children constitute the grave problem. They become infected with the air of freedom about them. Parents, slow to adapt themselves, are despised and disobeyed as old-fashioned. The young man grows up to be the gangster and the criminal or the loafer. The young woman becomes the shallow, selfish, gaudy travesty on the healthy independence brought in touch most intimately and lastingly with the coming generation, while the nation draws the interest on the investment in better citizenship. Let us enter a typical school to see how the work is carried on. The school has its regular principal, usually a young university man. Yale, Harvard, Columbia, Cornell and a dozen other institutions supply the men. The prinlogue that have been lost in these strata of society must be rediscovered and solidly anchored. Withal the instruction must be made so interesting that the children freely want to come again. When the dogdays are at hand and the sweltering heat beats down mercilessly from a cloudless sky, when the whole atmosphere is heavy with heat and dust and tenement odors; then it is a problem, indeed, to keep alive the interest and enthusiasm among these children of the poor, who ought to be out in the woods and meadows rejoicing in God's nature with the free abandon of childhood.

AFTER the day's work is discussed and mapped out the staff goes out into the neighborhood, "the highways and byways," to extend and build up the usefulness of the school. Homes are visited in order to gain their co-operation. Prospects of new scholars are followed up. Absentees are brought back. Perhaps groups of children are met playing on the streets. They are invited to come in.

At 9:30 the opening bell is sounded. The whole school is assembled and opens its day with the singing of a hymn. After the hymn a lesson of Scripture is read. Then comes the daily lesson on character, after which the kindergarten goes out. The next half hour is devoted to the daily Bible story, which is taught in groups and made graphic by the use of sand-tables, pictures or models. Then comes a twenty-minute period of singing, and the final hour is devoted to manual work and play. The boys make hammocks, the girls make baskets or raffia work or they sew. Sometimes games are arranged to relieve the daily routine. The day closes with the singing of "America" and with the pledge of allegiance to the flag. Two hours of instruction in which every moment leads the children into the better, nobler things of life, and withal it is so varied and interesting that they all enjoy it and love to come again.

However, this does not measure the sum total of the school's activity. For the afternoon excursions and games are arranged to relieve the drabness of tenement living. Parks are visited or all repair to some nearby playground, and rollicking youth gets full opportunity to romp and play till gathering dusk bids them come home.

The children are not only passive recipients of the favors provided for them. They are taught to think of others. Each school has a daily thank-offering of pennies, the total used to equip new schools. Last year this offering reached nearly $900. When one considers that much of this comes from children who must themselves work as bootblacks, paper-boys, or at the varied industries of the tenement, the story of the widow's mite seems quite appropriate. The girls, even the little ones, sew dolls' dresses for sick children in the hospitals. Many of the things made by the children as part of the manual training are sold at an annual bazaar in New York City, the proceeds of which are also used to extend the school.

Every great idea in life is simple. It would be difficult to find in the range of efficient spiritual helpfulness an idea more simple and in every way adapted to the needs it meets than to enlist college men and women during the summer months to teach the young God's way and God's will. It makes them bigger men and women as it enlarges their vision of service. It reaches out to God's little ones to lead them up to their heavenly Father. It infuses into churches the warm life blood of active spiritual usefulness. The phenomenal growth in fourteen years from a little beginning to an organization reaching from New York to the Golden Gate proves its possibilities. They have just begun to be realized.

of our American girls. Both are God's children. Both had the making of useful manhood and womanhood in them. The slums, the sweatshop, the tenement exist for no other reason than that we have not been able to give to the immigrant the civic and spiritual ideals of this nation. To give him these is far better than the most detailed code of laws. They give him the power to rise. The best laws merely toss and shift him about, as helpless and low as before.

IN this service lies, perhaps, the most promising possibility of the Vacation Bible School. The staff are young men and women whose young enthusiasm and ideals and fuller grasp of the need by virtue of their training adapt them peculiarly to guide these foreign children. Churches are

The school session begins at 9:30. But before the opening of the board of strategy meets to map out the day's campaign. Board of strategy it might well be called, for the teaching and administration are by no means simple and routine. The children are there by their own free will. Race and neighborhood suspicions must be overcome by kindness. Discipline and order must be maintained among children that otherwise are as free from restraint as the birds of the sky. The habits of filth and personal slovenliness must be overcome with patient insistence. Great portions of the deca-

A REAL CHURCH IN A SHANTY

IN the melodious tones of a negro congregation of singers, the strains of "Greenland's Icy Mountains to India's Coral Strand" greeted me as I came upon the building shown above. (I was making some inquiries into living conditions in a city of Alabama.) The building was out of plumb, and had to be propped to keep it from falling over. At the door I learned it was a church, and that the group of colored women inside were holding a missionary meeting. It was just such a church as you would picture as needing missionary aid; yet plans were being laid

IT IS through Ivory Soap that Young America passes from the playground to the dinner table. Ivory scrubs the dirty hands. Ivory washes the streaked faces. Ivory bathes the perspiring bodies. Ivory shampoos the tousled heads. And Ivory launders the fresh, clean clothes that complete the transformation.

The youthful minds may not grasp the meaning of "99 $\frac{44}{100}$ % Pure", "Freedom from alkali" and "Choicest materials suitable for soap making", but the youthful skins are grateful when soap does not smart or burn and garments come from the wash soft, smooth and comfortable.

TRIUMPHS OF THE CROSS

THINK of a communion service attended by seven thousand seven hundred and seventy persons! That number were present at a service held at Elat in the interior of Kamerun, Africa, on the first Sunday of January of the present year. Many confessed Christ, and the offering for the year amounted to over 800 marks.

The more than eleven hundred missionaries now in the field not one has asked to come home because of disturbed conditions due to the war, and of the missionaries at home on furlough not one has refused to go back when the board has so requested, and now the board is importuned by the furloughed missionaries from Mexico, China and India and other places asking that they might be permitted to return. The foregoing information concerning Presbyterian missions comes to the Christian Herald in a report from Dr. A. W. Halsey, secretary of the board. Speaking of the missions and the war, Dr. Halsey writes: "Great missions, such as the one in Africa, the Shantung Mission in China, the Syria Mission and the Persia Mission, have been directly in the war zone. Much property has been lost, suffering endured, and many lives lost. In the Persia Mission alone, for weeks the board's missionaries have cared for 15,000 refugees, giving out some three tons of bread per day, ministering to many in sickness day by day burying at least forty who have succumbed to disease or to cruel treatment, and in many instances, through timely intervention, saving the lives of persecuted Armenians or Syrians.

Large problems confront the board in view of the disturbed world conditions. There must be many adjustments. The British and other foreign societies including the German and French, have already many of them, notified our board that they will be unable to carry on their work for the next year or two, and will look to us to care for their shepherdless sheep. In Syria, in China, in India, and possibly other fields, this will entail large burdens on the workers already in the field, but no word of complaint has come from them as they have begun to assume this extra burden."

FINANCIALLY, the year for the Presbyterian Board has been triumphant. The receipts during the year amounted altogether to 37 per cent. more than those received the year previous. Altogether $2,287,076 were raised and a total of $2,257,000 expended.

The American Baptist Foreign Missionary Society announced some months ago that it would be necessary to make their budget for 1915 $100,000 less than that of last year. Among the protests aroused by this announcement were the following brave and cheering messages: "Decidedly no. I will be glad to be one of one hundred to give $1,000 each, in addition to what I give to the treasury of my church." "I am opposed to a reduction in any line of our missionary enterprise. Press the work with renewed vigor. It is the most pathetic appeal that has come to me. I have given $26.50 a year for missions and thought that was all I could, but if you do not retrench like this I will double the amount." "Enclosed please find my check for one thousand dollars toward the work of the American Baptist Missionary Society for the year 1915."

The result of this agitation was a great rally on the part of Baptists throughout the country, so that the Northern Convention repudiated the proposed retrenchment and directed the board to go just as far as possible toward equaling the work of last year. It has already been determined that the missionaries now on furlough will be sent to the field during the coming year.

The showing for the year just closed was most gratifying. William B. Lippard, assistant secretary of the board, writes to the Christian Herald: "In a financial way perhaps the most notable achievement of the year was the raising of the accumulated deficit of $182,000." The total receipts for Baptist foreign missionary work under the Northern Convention last year were $1,356,821.91.

The Bulletin of the Baptist Board says: "The non-Christian world is telling the foreign missionary that a Christianity which fails in Europe is not wanted in China and Japan. The castman of India listens respectfully to the missionary's address and then points significantly to the neighboring district, whence a regiment of Hindus has left in order to reinforce the army of a so-called Christian nation in Europe. In the war zone the artillery has destroyed numerous church buildings; the male membership, including the pastors, is in the army; church activity is demoralized, congregations have ceased, and the widows and children wander about in dire suffering and distress. How shall this crisis be met? More missionaries must be sent to the non-Christian world to demonstrate that Christianity has not failed, but rather that Europe has failed to apply Christianity. Workers of other societies in financial distress must be aided, thereby exemplifying the unity of Christendom and the oneness of the missionary task."

The Foreign Mission Board of the Southern Baptist Convention reports $537,073.66 raised for the year just closed. Missionaries of that body reported 5,190 baptisms for the year, and this number would probably be larger except for the fact that reports from South Mexico and North Brazil had not arrived when this statement was made.

FOR the Board of Foreign Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church Mr. George Heber Jones writes as follows: "The income of the Methodist Board of Foreign Missions for the fiscal year ending October 31, 1914, was as follows: Regular gifts, $1,170,258, an increase over the previous year of $12,789; special gifts, $418,496; increase, $93,438; total receipts, $1,588,754; total increase of $106,227. The bulk of this increase was due to a special appeal sent out by the board for a war relief fund."

The greatest advance movement on the foreign field in the Methodist work is in India. Church history presents fewer scenes more pathetic than these clamoring thousands of the natives of India who are seeking Christian instruction and baptism. Together with the spiritual revival is a wonderful movement of social uplift among India's millions resulting from the contact of the missionaries with the depressed classes. Concerning the work in other fields Mr. Jones adds: "In Japan the Three Years' Evangelistic Campaign now under way, in which the Methodist missionaries are co-operating with the other communions, is meeting with a most encouraging response.

"In China details of the transformation of Peking University from a denominational school into a union institution are well under way. An unusual evangelistic opportunity confronts us everywhere throughout that republic as a result of the work done among the students, commercial guilds and gentry by Dr. Mott and Mr. Eddy. In Malaysia the eager thirst of the young people of the great new Chinese populations throughout the Asiatic tropics has overwhelmed our mission schools. In the Philippines the board has plans to meet its higher educational needs for the growing Filipino church by utilizing the facilities offered in the new Governmental University at Manila. In Africa we are in the midst of the most remarkable year of our history in that country."

THE Secretary of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church, Mr. John Wilson Wood, makes this statement: "The Episcopal Church combines its home and foreign work under a single Board of Missions. The board is now drawing towards the end of its fiscal year, which runs from September 1 to August 31. So far as gifts are concerned, it is having the most remarkable year in its history. To June 1 its income from the usual sources shows an increase of about $25,000 over last year, which in turn showed a considerable advance over any previous year. During the past two months the Board of Missions has been engaged in an effort to raise an additional Emergency fund of $400,000, and has already secured $210,000 of this amount. Within recent months the board has raised nearly $200,000 for what is known as its New-China fund for the purchase of land and erection of buildings in the China field. At the same time, through an affiliated committee, more than $150,000 have been raised in this country for the enlargement of St. Luke's Hospital, Tokyo.

"Two mission hospitals for Indians in Alaska are now in process of erection at different points on the Yukon River. Within a few months the board expects to begin the erection of the first buildings for the new St. Paul's College in Tokyo. Eleven acres of land have been secured for this purpose, and plans have been prepared providing for an expenditure of about $250,000."

FOR the American Board, the official organization of Congregational Missions, Mr. Cornelius N. Patton writes as follows: "Our budget runs to about $1,100,000. We are hoping to raise this full amount by August 31. As for plans we are going to link up strong with the Laymen's Missionary Conventions during the fall and winter. It is our opinion that we are now on the top of the wave of missionary opportunity and that during the next ten years we should see a very rapid spread of Christianity in non-Christian lands."

Other messages were received in response to the Christian Herald's request for information. The Reformed Church in America reports: "A special effort has been made during the spring to increase our income by Easter offerings, self-denial offerings, etc., in response to which we have received over

THE LIMITATIONS OF OPPORTUNITY

Hebrews 3:15.

THIS section of the Epistle to the Hebrews is devoted to two main objects: first, to convince its readers that an ineffable rest is reserved for those who have accepted the Gospel of the New Testament; and second, to warn them against the temptations which had kept God's chosen race out of that rest. In pursuit of these aims the inspired author brings into this discourse argument, exegesis, quotations from Holy Writ, and fervid reiterated exhortations. If unbelief and disobedience had operated so disastrously under former dispensations, how much more fatal would be their evil effects now that the Son of God had appeared! The divine call addressed to all men through him was far more stringent and imperative than the entreaties of prophets and psalmists.

Earlier revelations may have suffered delay, but the era of light and truth upon which the world had now entered was none other than that of the Most High. None could treat its significant overtures with contempt, nor waste its precious opportunities in foolish and wicked recreancy. Neither could they regard themselves as free to follow its requirements at their leisure. The authority of illustrious leaders such as Moses and David was invoked in behalf of prompt and unreserved acquiescence with the divine mandates. For man's life was but a brittle thread liable to break at any moment, his generation passed rapidly off the stage of action and each sunset betokened the flight of privileges which would never come again. The brief span of human existence, the fleeting openings for human betterment, showed the salutary wisdom of seeking the Lord while he might be found and calling upon him when he was near. The sacred annals bore sad witness that golden occasions had been despitefully used, and that anarchy and idolatry had dogged the steps of the Israelites during their wanderings in the desert.

The vast majority of those who set out from Egypt, rejoicing in their new-found freedom, had never reached the promised land. Likewise, the magnificent religious heritage of the Davidic era had been forfeited because sinful interests had crowded it out of the heart and mind of the elect race. When Christ came their cup of iniquity was filled to the brim, they had reached the end of their probation, and even while the writer was penning this letter the knell of their doom was already sounding. Weighed in the balance and found wanting, henceforth their only hope was in the Everlasting Mercy. The derelict sons of Abraham either had to bow before Him whom they had crucified or their candlestick would be removed from the divine presence.

True and applicable to them, these solemn adjurations are equally true and applicable to us. Every soul which this inquiry touches is in the grasp of God and can never be exempt from his judgments. His offers of redemption are neither as ranging as space nor as enduring as eternity. The periods during which the heart of man remains susceptible, tender, open to faith and duty, are like the recurrent seasons of the year. They come but to go; age cannot reproduce the elasticity and impressionable states of youth; the calloused and debauched reprobate cannot experience the highest ministries of the Blessed Spirit. He never speaks within us as if we had ample time in which to make our due submission and work out our salvation. He never permits us to dictate our own place or terms of deliverance. All his movements which mold our conscious experience are rigidly defined and indicate that the divine possibilities of our being are terminable, not lasting. His living appeals are full of urgent, instantaneous solicitude, and of the sense of an imminent peril for those who disregard his admonitions. He shuts up our powers of choice within certain prescribed areas, and if he is driven away, he leaves us sadly and regretfully, but with no certitude that he will return. "My spirit shall not always strive with man," saith the Lord, and in that awe-inspiring utterance the welfare of untold myriads is deeply involved.

These considerations consort with the grandeur and dignity of God, who makes his final proposition to the creature in Jesus Christ. To ask that he shall await our pleasure and hang upon our nod is an attempt to invert the proper relations between the Creator and his offspring. Whatever we have which is worth having we derive from him, and his saving truth is not our option, it is our necessity, which we must accept or face the consequences. Any effort to escape his inevitable decrees will thus recoil upon itself and may leave us shelterless in the hurricane of approaching retribution. An earthly ruler issues his directions to his subordinates fully expecting that they will follow them implicitly. That which he enjoins must be done quickly at any expenditure of will or energy. If such a potentate refuses to parley or delay, how much less will the King of kings! And what should be our bearing toward the precepts and counsels of his benevolence? He would discredit himself and humiliate the Son of his love if he consented to linger at the door of our hearts like a servitor, or repeat his offers of forgiveness with the supplicating air of a beggar. Be assured that before his ordinations all opposition must finally collapse. There is an august and a peremptory insistence in his laws which rends the heavens and subdues the earth. The subject matter of his revealed truth is intense, unyielding, impatient of hindrances. Infatuated sinners may begin with one accord to make excuses, and unitedly decline to put first things first, but in so doing they invite their own fate. His voice forever proclaims across the centuries the inviolability of right and wrong and their outworkings beyond the present. Opinions change, manners alter, customs become obsolete, creeds rise and fall, but the moral integrity God asks for in us is inscribed on the tablets of eternity. For every false word or unrighteous deed, for all lust or vanity, for all pride or mammonism, the full price has to be paid at last.

Procrastination in Spiritual Things

The only alternative is that repentance which needs not be repented of, and a humble undeviating trust in Christ as our personal Redeemer. Nothing is so blind or delusive as the fatuous temper which faintly cherishes the larger hope while persevering in wrong-doing, and imagines that by some haphazard means it can dodge the consequences of habitual and wilful transgression. Whatever we know of God, and of ourselves, and of the fundamental virtues, and of the perishableness of material things, combines to bid us at once prepare for immortality by cultivating those spiritual capacities which alone can bless and protect our future. We might as well ask some poor wretch suffocating to death in a fiery den to postpone his rescue as nourish the idea that we can safely remain unmoved in foul and fearful habits of living and at the same time bid God depart until it suits our convenience to hearken to him. The cross which Christ wet with his actual sacrificial blood has consecrated his Father's business, and that business requires haste on our part. God will not tolerate slackness or indifference: "Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation."

Moreover, time limits are the more necessary because, like Naaman the Syrian, we are always seeking some other river in which to wash and be clean. The simple teachings of the Gospel are repugnant to perverse and haughty minds. They would prefer to find their own way of escape from self and sin, and while they haggle and debate over the most precious gift heaven has bestowed on earth they grow less and less inclined to rise up and follow the Master. It is a very common occurrence that the task perennially put off becomes distasteful and far less likely of achievement. But when our engagements are predetermined for us we have nothing left except to fall in with them. The things men and women must do, whether they are willing to do them or not, make the discipline and energy of their being. Compelled fidelity is not as admirable as when it is voluntary, but at least it energizes us, bids us awake from our sleeping and slumbering, and arise from the death in which we are corrupted that Christ may give us life. Who then is so misdirected as to entertain the baseless assumption that a compassionate Father must needs be always a rejected God? If he should repeat beyond the grave the opportunities and privileges we now enjoy, could we be sure that we should be any more freely and nobly disposed toward them? Nay, such insolent trifling with the heart of the Everlasting ill becomes our helplessness. He measures out our hours and whatever they contain, and until we, too, have learned to allocate them accordingly, we cannot be sure as to what they will bring forth. Besides, spiritual development is the most serious undertaking we can assume. In its behalf the Bible constantly and earnestly beseeches us to forsake our misdoings, to immediately serve Him who has made the tale of our years and their irrevocable d. Thus is it well for us that we are faced by appointed times, seasons, conditions, inspirations, or few be found among the godly who delight to fulfill the Eternal Will.

Let Us Awake Out of Sleep

Again, these boundaries are prescribed because revolt and ruin seethe within us and their arrest must be made on the spot. Once their baleful process get the upper hand they mutilate soul and body. Conscience and reason are ravaged by them, and the effectual contact of faith is rendered almost impossible. We may be at a standstill on this supreme issue, but the devilish hosts that rage within us are never idle. The deceits of the eye and the desires of the flesh know no halting. Seeds of dissolution find fertile soil in wayward hearts, and unless they are exterminated as soon as detected, the problem of how to get rid of them is very difficult.

In tropical latitudes the competition of the forest is so keen that the trees which shed their leaves at nightfall have to renew them before morning or the creepers spring up and choke the trees to death. Similarly rank poisonous growths luxuriate upon us, parasites that feed on our spirits, and they can never be handled by half-measures of reform or resolutions against them which are made only to be broken. A regenerated man quivering with God's life, vibrant in every part, suffused with divine power, is the only type that can withstand these assaults of evil, and it is a matter for devoutest gratitude that this generation can be just as swift and vital as a swift and blighting.

Take a careful retrospect of the ways of God toward man, and of the innate tendencies of mankind, if you would be convinced of the infinite value of this Scripture upon which we are meditating. Never interfere with the limits and boundaries it mentions. Reverence and regard them. Remember that after you have selected the forces your only freedom on earth is to choose to whom or to what you will commit that freedom. "Harden not our hearts," as in the days of provocation, or you will come to the period when your spiritual paralysis is complete, and the good you would you cannot do, while the evil you would not, you cannot avoid. This is the second death, over which this world has no control, and which is the dread mystery of the other world. The stiffening of the moral muscles, the blurring of the spiritual vision, the decay of the entire fabric of the innermost being move forward like some fatal disease which knows itself sure of its victim and therefore can afford to wait. Atrocity in every essential quality, crippled so as to be helpless and untouched before the goings forth of God in ways of praise and spiritual profit, how desperate is this melancholy and self-wrought dissolution! There is a constantly widening alienation of interest and sympathy from religious realities. The latter days are full of heaviness and repining.

This deterioration fell upon the abject and ungrateful faction which opposed Moses; it worked by a leaven of perdition among those who condescended and crucified Christ, and it still works because it is hell's chief agent. Repeat your disavowals of sin, and your sensibilities become indurated, villanous, antagonistic. The degradation of your own nature tramples under foot the Son of God, and ends the splendid prospects he has created for you. We are only sure, then, of the moment; we can only live today; but we can so live today as to bid tomorrow do its worst, and give up its best to our vicious progress. Nothing is guaranteed twelve hours hence, everything is ours now. Let us validate our coronation with eternal life and holiness, and fervently praise the Great Lover of souls to continue in us, unwavering though we are, his work of cleaning until death shall seal his endless mercies and make the offering complete.

Because the head is larger than the heart some people seem to think that if they have head religion they are more religion than those who have heart religion.

The selfish man rarely offers the milk of human kindness until he has skimmed the cream for himself, while the unselfish man, who is rare, often gives the cream to others and keeps for himself what is left.

UNCLE SAMUEL'S WATERING-CANS

BEHIND ELEPHANT BUTTE DAM NOW ALMOST COMPLETED ON THE RIO GRANDE PROJECT, AND FACE OF THE SAME DAM

pose a former friend whose glad tail had ceased to wag, or rather forever had ceased to wag—though I don't know but that the first way of putting it was correct, remembering that tail. I resented that moul's hindrance to a swift passage about the garden. But what if it had been a mountain range? The thoughts of what might have been come to me as I contemplate my Uncle Samuel's mountain-strewn garden patches of thousands of arid acres each, and watch him use his large watering-cans.

As a matter of fact Uncle Sam has about 45,000,000 arid acres of garden ground, which he intends to put under cultivation. When he took hold of this proposition in 1902, private persons had pioneered in irrigating work and had gotten some ten million acres under cultivation. But Uncle Sam thought he could look after the matter more economically, and he tied his man, the secretary of the interior, loose on the job. The secretary hired some men as a sort of reclamation crew, and went at it. And that is his reclamation crew or bureau, as they are called, who have Uncle Sam's watering problem.

It's a problem. Too big a one to be tackled all at once, and that is why only about five million of the forty-five million are being worked at present. And they are divided into about thirty widely separated tracts, each of them containing thousands of acres, one of them alone over half a million. That one is called the Yak a reclamation project, in the state of Washington; on the map with this story the "units" Sunny-side and Tieton are in that project. The smallest project of all is not on this map: it is the Lawton, Oklahoma, and comprises 3,000 acres.

All these projects are well advanced today. Uncle Sam isn't another piece of work on his vast estate; it's interesting and refreshing. And yet it is the doing on a gigantic scale what I had to do here, and for the same reason. The rain kindly filled our cistern and then went about its business until the next picnic day. In the interval, everything dried up excepting the cistern. I used to wish it would. But it defeated all my rebellious efforts to empty it, and gave forth its stored-up plant tonic until, as I say, another proposed picnic inevitably brought on a three-day downpour.

Up on the high altitudes of the western states, where the rainfall is even more erratic, flooding the streams at one time until they burst their banks, and then holding off until even the river bottoms appear, the Reclamation Bureau is building huge cisterns and hundreds of miles of canals, through which to carry the stored-up plant tonic to fertile soil that is but waste desert without such artificial watering. These cisterns and canals are wonderful engineering feats. Whole rivers are welled in and their flow regulated to the needs of the land; great lakes are tapped and drawn off like ice-water through a refrigerator's faucet. Many a stomach ache I have acquired as a boy by placing my lips about such a faucet after a strenuous game of one o' cat played in 92 degrees Fahrenheit, and letting the delicious stream gurgle down. And where there are no handy rivers and lakes, mere streams are converted into one or the other as the special needs of the locality require.

For example, take the Orland project in California, about ninety miles north of Sacramento. Here some 20,000 acres, at a general altitude of 250 feet above sea level, are to have their dormant fertility made productive by irrigation from a lake and a river which the Reclamation Bureau are constructing out of a creek. A dam about forty miles from Orland stores the water of Stony Creek in a reservoir, aided by the rainy season, and then the natural channel of the stream is utilized for a forty-five-mile river to convey an abundant flow in dry times to where the land lies thirsting for it. This artificial river is then diverted into 135 miles of distribution canals and laterals, and through that huge sprayer end of the system Uncle Sam waters that particular patch of ground. Alfalfa, nuts, the soil is packed with plant foods. The annual freshet was wasted, for the land it touched could soak in only just so much. I suppose those reclamation fellows, watching one of those spring freshets, felt like I used to when a cloudburst would drench my speck of earth: they wished the thing could be held back, harnessed, cooped up and then fed out a little at a time and to vastly bigger stretches of land. And now here is what is happening at Milk River:

High up in Glacier National Park lie four great lakes; two by the name of Sherburne, McDermott, and Lower St. Mary's. They are perpetually fed by the snow and melting glacier ice of the Rocky Mountain range. Glacier water is rich in silt and exceedingly fertile. But the lakes are two hundred miles from the Milk River project by a direct route, over which it would be impossible to convey their inexhaustible supply. The project, moreover, is itself about 140 miles long, and as wide as three miles at some points. Yet those great natural reservoirs, and the efficient but inadequate Milk River, are being joined together into one immense irrigation system, one of the biggest if not the biggest the government has in hand. Immense dams, huge siphons, tremendous flumes, and miles of canal conduct the lake waters at will to the north branch of Milk River, and thence by the latter's winding channel a distance of over five hundred miles in all from the source of supply to the distribution canals that will give Montana a "Green Ribbon Belt" of invaluable agricultural land. For 150 miles the waterway lies within Canadian territory, and international agreements have been necessary in order to make this wonderful watering-pot available. Some thirty garden patches, more or less on this order, Uncle Sam now has undertaken to water. It keeps his hired men on the jump. To take care of 140,000 acres in Colorado, the Uncompahgre Valley project, they had to bore a tunnel 30,645 feet long, 10½ by 11½ feet cross section, cement lined, through a mountain range. This engineering feat gives capacity for a flow of 1,300 cubic feet per second. The tract is between five thousand and six thousand feet in altitude, which seems to be good for agricultural brains, as the farmers there are progressive, being organized for mutual benefit through cooperative methods, one of which is the buying of household and farm supplies by the carload lots, with a consequent saving to the individual family.

To supply the Rio Grande project in New Mexico and Texas, the reclamation men have constructed an artificial lake forty-five miles long, with a storage capacity of 2,627,777 acre-feet. An acre-foot of water is enough water to cover a whole acre one foot deep. The dam that holds back this small ocean, the Elephant Butte dam now being constructed across the Rio Grande near Engle, is to be one of the largest of the service, 290 feet high and 1,400 feet long on top.

True, the Mareb project in Yemen, Arabia, in the very beginnings of irrigation, boasted a dam two miles long and 120 feet high, built of immense hewn blocks of stone; which we must admit was a bigger engineering task than Elephant Butte. The Mareb dam held back the waters of a stream fed by seventy tributaries, and stood the strain for two thousand years. But it burst at last, and with appalling results.

fruits, and many other crops from soil that otherwise would be barren, are the result. The dairy is a flourishing feature of this, as of many other reclamation projects of our Uncle Samuel.

ON the other hand, consider the Milk River project in Montana. Although 2,000 feet above sea level, this 220,000-acre tract is really in a valley. When Milk River is in flood, near-by acres get some temporary benefit, just as our backyard garden used to from a thunderstorm. But outside that river-edge strip, the land remains arid and unproductive, though

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

TEXAS HARD HIT BY STORM. The brief mention made last week of the tropical storm that had damaged Galveston was like all the early news reports in the East, out of all proportion to the importance of the occurrence. The terrific onslaught of wind and rain struck Galveston late in the forenoon of August 16, and at 9:30 that night word was sent out via telephone to Houston that little damage had resulted, the sea wall, and the causeway that connects the island on which Galveston stands with the mainland, being reported uninjured. But at the expiration of another twenty-four hours the full extent of the storm's work began to become known. The causeway had been cut, thus temporarily shutting off the only land connection with the mainland, shipping had been swept from the Gulf, the great sea wall, built after the storm of 1900, was down for a thousand feet, and telephone and telegraph wires were almost entirely out of business. Galveston was isolated from the world. A score of persons had perished and the property loss was very great, possibly as high as $15,000,000. At other points along the coast and for a hundred miles inland, the hurricane had carried destruction. In all more than 100 lives may have been lost, many of these on barges and other boats which went down. The fury of the storm was felt well out on the Gulf. Reports from the Bay towns and remote points have come in slowly. Houston was very badly buffeted by the gale, and there and at Texas City hundreds of small buildings were wrecked. The historic storm of September 8, 1900, in which 8000 persons perished, is said to have been nearly equaled by this tropical hurricane, but the sea wall, despite the breach made in it, saved the city.

AS TO OVER-ZEALOUS GERMAN PROPAGANDISTS. The New York World, as mentioned last week, has printed a mass of documentary evidence of the existence in this country of a well organized pro-German propaganda, intent on frustrating the plans of the Allies in the matter of war munitions contracts and on presenting Germany's side in the war news to the American people. The World's belief that our neutrality laws have been disregarded by the friends of Germany appears not to be well founded, as United States Attorney General Gregory declares that the Department of Justice, whose officials have been closely following the disclosures, as well as constantly conducting investigations of their own, has found nothing to warrant the taking of action against any one on either side.

DEAN OF CATHOLIC CHURCH DIES. Cardinal Bishop Serafino Vannutelli, dean of the Sacred College, died at the Vatican on August 19, aged 81. This prelate was one of the most distinguished of the Roman Catholic Church. It was his brother, Cardinal Vincenzo Vannutelli, whose visit here in 1910 on the occasion of the consecration of St. Patrick's Cathedral was marked by a great religious celebration.

TO ERECT NEW STRONGHOLD FOR CONFUCIANISM. Financiers, scholars, merchants will establish a college at Tsingtau, Shan-tung Province, original home of the old Chinese civilization, with the object of reviving the teachings of Confucius and Mencius, China's ancient great sages. The movement is supposed to have more of a scholastic than a religious purpose.

LEO FRANK LYNCHED BY MOB. A mob, said to have consisted chiefly of the better class of men and carefully drilled for the task, stormed the Georgia State prison farm at Milledgeville on August 16, ten o'clock at night, seized Leo M. Frank, who had been convicted of the murder of Mary Phagan and was serving a life sentence committed from the death penalty by former Governor Slaton, carried him to near the home town of the girl (Marietta), and there hung him. Later his body was cut down and to some extent disfigured by men in the crowd of morbid people who thronged to the spot immediately the news was learned. Still later the body was delivered to Frank's relatives in Brooklyn and buried.

MANUFACTURER TO DEVOTE WEALTH TO PEACE. "I will do everything in my power to prevent murderous, wasteful war in America and in the whole world." So speaks Henry A. Ford, the Detroit manufacturer. "I will devote my life to fight this spirit, which is not felt in the free and peaceful air of the United States, the spirit of militarism, mother to the cry of 'preparedness,' 'preparedness,' the root of all war. I would teach the child at its mother's knee what a horrible, wasteful and unavailing thing war is. In the home and in the schools of the world I would see the child taught to feel the uselessness of war, that war is a thing unnecessary. That preparation for war can only end in war."

"I have prospered much and I am ready to give much to end this constant, wasteful preparation, not by building palaces of peace, not by inspiring fearful peace by powerful armament, but by teaching the men, women and children of America that war does not threaten us, that war will not reach us, that the fullness of peace is in their inheritance, not the burden of militarism, with its heavy hand that curbs liberty and its foul sustenance upon the blood, the labor and the toil earned happiness and goods of the worker. This I would make a world work for all the world craves for peace, and there can be no peace while there remains one set of these militaristic parasites who encourage war and who damn all those ideas of patriotism and love of their fellow men do not call for arming brother against brother."

"I want to see this nation and all the nations of the earth nourishing that feeling, already deeply implanted in the minds and hearts of millions, that is expressed in the words, 'We do not want war. We will not have war. We will not have among us the breeders of war, be they men who cry out that the enemy seeks us and we must prepare for him or be they only those who would dazzle with the false glory that has been the cloak of murder for centuries.' If I can but see the world—and America is the brain of the world and the brain is the guide of all—moving toward that day when war shall cease, when nations shall not burden the workers with the enormous expense of huge armaments and then destroy the workers with those very armaments, I shall be content to end my days where I began—an humble worker in a peaceful world."

The Call of the Woods

THE oasis in the desert these hot days is the good, green, moist-breathed woods.

Vacation joys, like most others, are sweetest when simplest.

People are planning elaborate vacation trips at expense they cannot well afford, will put up with high-priced inconveniences they would not tolerate at home, and will come back more tired than when they went away.

But out of the dirt and rattle and confusion of the city there is easy escape in the shady, silent woods that are cool, clean, sweet, odorous, musical.

Here are real rest for worn nerves and true quickening of the flagging spirit.

What a noble gift to mankind are the trees! How pleasantly their shadows fall upon us when we turn to them from the glitter and turmoil of the hot city! The breath of heaven seems to linger in the whispering branches, and the sunshine sifts through the swaying leaves, like a benediction purified.

In the close application of the detail of our work we are apt to distort the perspective of our purposes. We are apt to plod on through habit and forget our higher aims. Maybe some of us never had any. Then all the more do we need a time to dream. Men without definite aims and purposes beyond mere means of comfortable existence are animals on two legs with nothing to recompense the loss of the monkey tail.

A week in the woods, with your ear close to Mother Nature's heart and your eyes finding vistas up into the blue eternal mystery, may teach you that your little selfish strivings, your puny vanities, your petty hatreds and jealousies, that make up so large a part of your daily living and your nightly worrying, are of no more worth to the world or you than are the nameless little gnats that so foolishly zigzag in the glooms.

KING COTTON, TAKEN CAPTIVE, MAY BE RANSOMED. By a British Order-in-Council, cotton has at last been declared absolute contraband of war, effective from August 21 and the continuance of the war, or until further public notice. The principal ground for this action is understood to be the use of cotton in the manufacture of smokeless powder. Secretary McAdoo, on August 23, made announcement through the Treasury Department that, if necessary, $30,000,000 would be deposited in banks of the Federal Reserve System in the interval of marketing this year's crop.

EVERYBODY PLEASE NOTE THIS. It is about time declared unfashionable to wear jewelry out of season. We suggest this hint from the American Retail Jewelers Association now in convention in New York.

HAITI IS SOMEWHAT RAMBLING. It has been necessary for the Navy Department to detail another warship, the armored cruiser Tennessee, with a battalion of marine artillery, 350 men and twelve field pieces, to reinforce the American forces trying to maintain order in the Haitian Republic, as there is disposition on the part of the belligerent element there to resist American temporary occupation.

PROGRAM FOR A SOCIAL REVOLUTION. What amounts practically to a social and industrial revolution is recommended in the main report of the Industrial Relations Commission, part of which was made public on August 22. The commission will present two reports, all of which recommend some action by Congress to remedy the existing injustices of the present industrial system. The main report is signed by Chairman Walsh, John B. Lennon, James O. Smith and Austin B. Garretson. One of the reports is signed by Professor J. H. Commons and Mrs. J. Borden Heaman. This second report is in the main concerned with and supported by Communist, Weinstock, Ballard and Aisht, who make, however, certain exceptions which are set forth in a third report. The main report finds the causes of industrial unrest in the unjust distribution of wealth and income; unemployment; denial of opportunity to earn a living; denial of justice in the creation, adjudication and administration of law; an denial of the right to form effective labor organizations. On the matter of unjust distribution of wealth and income the evidence shows that forty-four families have aggregate incomes of fifty million dollars a year. It is estimated that this is equivalent to the earnings of 100,000 wage workers at the average rate of $500 a year. It is asserted that those in control of great industrial operations control the affairs of the workers in certain localities as completely as though these communities were petty kingdoms instead of parts of the republic. These conditions are "oppressive to the dependent upon them for a livelihood, and a dreadful menace to the peace and welfare of the nation." Legislation is recommended which will make it impossible for a single fortune of more than a million dollars to be inherited. The remainder of any inheritance so limited shall be used by the government for the extension of education, development of other social services, and the development, in cooperation with states and municipalities, of great constructive works, such as road building, irrigation and reforestation. It is also recommended that Congress compel the management of all industries to grant to their workers the right and opportunity to form effective labor organizations. Among the suggested duties to protect this right is one prohibiting discharge of a worker because he belonged to a labor organization, another making it unlawful for labor unions to do anything not unlawful for an individual, and another providing for mandatory investigation by the Federal Trade Commission of unfair treatment of labor unions at their members. The second report, while eliminating some of the recommendations of the first, advises a large inheritance tax and the right of labor to institute boycotts, either primary or secondary, without being liable to prosecution. It agrees with the first report that a condition of feudalism exists in the mining regions of Colorado, but decries the attempt to hold any single individual responsible. It also recommends that corporations and unions be removed from politics, and emphatically endorses the strike organization of labor. The third report dissents from the recommendation of the boycott, but acknowledges that there has been a great deal of evidence showing wrong-doing on the part of some employers in preventing employees from organizing, in controlling coal and legislation and in many other disreputable acts, such as employing gunmen in strikes. Commissioner Ballard presents a preliminary opinion, suggesting a national minimum wage law, workmen's insurance, a national eight-hour labor law. Several hundred and forty witnesses were examined by the Commission outside the field investigations made by its agents.

A Prayer for Peace

THE cannons roar on sea and shore; the bombs keep on dropping; the bullets zip and tear and rip without a sign of stopping. On field and hill they maim and kill; the trails they leave a sorry. And everywhere the soldiers fare it is the same old story. They left their plows, their hags and cows, their chickens, pigs and cattle; each raw recruit went forth to shoot and mow men in battle. They used their guns like valiant sons, they scattered like water; 'twas their delight when in a fight, to make a awful slaughter. Each day we read of thousands dead, and agonies sick and tired, and hoped that we the day might see when guns were fired. But still they scrap and change the names and keep right on a-shootin', the drums still beat to marching and bugles keep on tootin'. Oh, let us pray to speed the day when guns shall quit their sputter; when war shall cease, and man, in peace, shall earn his bread and butter!

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR. LED BY J. H. JOWETT, D.D., F. B. MEYER, D.D., REV. E. WHITTIER CASWELL AND CLAYTON S. COOPER

The Making of Heroes

SUNDAY, September 5. Daniel 11: 32. "The people that do know their God shall be strong, and shall do exploits." It is like a strong and noble tree, of which the roots are found in a certain knowledge, and the fruit in heroic deeds. Exploits are not manufactured goods. They are not the deliberate creation of set purpose. They are not weeds; they are fruits. They are not made; they are grown. They are not the startling surprises of occasional ventures; they are the natural and spontaneous expression of the habits of the soul. A true hero is always heroic. Sometimes his heroism is seen before the public, but he is still heroic when the audience is withdrawn. This kind of tree "yields her fruit every month"; that is to say, there is no season when its fruit cannot be found.

Therefore, a life is to abound in heroic deeds if it has the heroic nature. It must "be strong" if it is to "do exploits." Every other kind of heroism is superficial, and it will pass with the occasion which excited it. We want a heroism which is heroic in its secret thoughts. We want heroes who slay dragons in private. We want the royal courage which strangles unworthy impulse as soon as it is born. We want exploits in sacrificial thinking, magnificent conquests of selfishness in the quiet courts of the soul. A real hero must wrestle with lions and bears in the jungle of his own spirit, and there he must register a courage of which the world has no account. All of which means that a man must be a hero in the very pith and fiber of his being. It must be his nature to be heroic.

And how can we deal with a man's nature excepting through his God? How can we make the tree good? The prophet's word gives us the eternal answer: if man is to "be strong" he must "know God." All that is not the shallow knowledge of recognition; it is the vital knowledge of communion, it is the peaking of the divine nature. It is the living fellowship which makes a man a branch on the living vine. The life-sap of the tree of life pervades every fiber of living. He lives, yet not he, Christ liveth in him. Such a life all the fruit shall be exploits, and the fiber of the heroic shall be in everything. J. H. J.

Dedicating the Body

MONDAY, September 6. Isaiah 44: 1-11. "Another shall subscribe with his hand unto the Lord." The idea apparently here is that the words "to the Lord" shall be written as the headline of a sheet of paper, which should be afterwards covered by a long list of signatures. It is told of a young fellow who, having heard this idea expressed in an evangelist's address, he went home and to his room, took a sheet of paper, headed it with these words and wrote his name beneath. That was the beginning of a new life. There was no deep emotion, no conviction of sin or profound view of the Cross. It was just an act of the will, on which God's Spirit was exerting his gracious influence. Doubtless the emotion, contrition, an profound view of the Cross, with its sublime implications, would follow; but how many would end at a point of hesitation and disappointment, if they would but write their names under these words, and resolve that if they live, they will live unto the Lord, or if they die unto the Lord, always keeping their faces turned towards him in life and death!

The R. V. margin gives a very suggestive alternative reading, which reads thus: "Another shall write on his hand unto the Lord." It is as though each individual before were to go over the members of the body, and dedicate each to the service of Jesus. "Know ye not that your body is a temple of the Holy Ghost?" Every part of it is therefore sacred to his use. "Ye are not your own, ye are bought with a price; glorify God therefore in your body." It is as though we should write in invisible ink on every part of our physical frame the words, "Holiness to the Lord," or "Redeemed to Jesus." This would be specially suitable for the right hand with which we greet our friends, write our letters, and do the work of our life. Marvelous implement of my soul, I consecrate thee henceforth to my Lord! F. B. M.

The Shadow of Prosperity

TUESDAY, September 7. II Kings 20:13. "And Hezekiah hearkened unto them and showed them all the house of his precious things." The study of the career of Hezekiah, the great Jewish hero in an age of gloom, is timely for us in these latter days. Through the devoutness of this leader the people of God overcame their enemies, but at the end of his life the hero, who was a bulwark of power in adversity, shows the weakness of human nature in his day of physical triumph, in settling back upon his treasures and his splendor: we find him showing the Babylonians his riches like a vain child, and saying to Isaiah the prophet that there would be peace enough to last through his own days, as much as to say, "What matters it after I am dead?"

This king of Judah was like many of the men of our time: he was not quite big enough to endure prosperity. He was a most religious and devoted man through the most of his life of active fighting, but when he stood on his hill of victory, his power was turned into a weak display.

The test of success is a great test. It is so easy then to be proud of the wrong thing. We seek God in danger, in our affliction, and in the hour of severe struggles against the foes of our heart and our hand; but what about our piety when we stand on the hill of accomplishment? Are we then rather vain than proud? Do we then stand back and show off our treasures to the Babylonians?

I am thinking to-day of that success of the inner spiritual nature, that is not dulled by time nor treasure nor power. I am thinking of that inner gold of character that is the same through "summer's heat and winter's cold," that ability of spiritual eminence that remembers God and one's brother when life is crowned with blessings, as when it is filled with shadow. Today we in America are a favored nation. We are standing on the hill of prosperity. It is our hour of danger as well as our hour of success. Let us remember Hezekiah! Today is the day of thinking of our less favored brothers. C. S. C.

The Fruitfulness of Sacrifice

WEDNESDAY, September 8. John 12: 12-24. "If it die, it beareth much fruit." There are many lonely people in the world who complain of their loneliness, and account for it by the ravages of death or the gulf of distance. But is it not rather attributable to the fact that they have always consulted their own ease and well-being, and have never learnt that the cure of loneliness comes through sowing oneself in the grave of daily self-sacrifice? If the corn of wheat will fall into the ground and die, it will no longer abide alone.

Of course, we can never die in the measure in which Jesus died. None of us can make the sacrifice and expiation he made for sin. But we may fill up that which is behind his sufferings. Daily and hourly, we may put ourselves in the low place to help others to ascend; we may meekly bear sorrow that we may give others joy; we may go without things that would give us pleasure, so as to be able to enrich others. Above all, there is the daily crucifixion and burial of the self-life. A youth once asked Francis de Sales how to be delivered from the risings of pride and vanity. The master told him to go to the graveyard and, standing beside a grave in which a companion had recently been buried, to utter all manner of flattering words concerning his gifts and graces. The youth obeyed the strange injunction and presently returned. "Was there any response from the dead?" was the inquiry. "None whatever," was the reply. "Even so," came the advice, "reckon that through union with him who died on the cross, thou also art dead to all that would stir thee to pride and vain-glory!" When we begin to live this, the effect is amazing in our augmented influence on others. At once we begin to bear fruit. The energy that we conserve for ourselves begins to pass out almost unconsciously in vitalizing influence to others. F. B. M.

Loving-Kindness

THURSDAY, September 9. Ruth 2: 15. "Let her glean even among the sheaves, and reproach her not." The book of Ruth is the greatest pastoral idyll in literature. It is founded on loving-kindness, the loving-kindness of the Moabitess revealed to her family, and the loving-kindness of Boaz, the wealthy Israelite, to Ruth his kinswoman. It also contains the germ of that great-heartedness which is the center of the Gospel of Christian love.

It is a book that opens with tears and famine and ends with the sound of wedding bells. The story turns upon the straightforwardness of Boaz, who showed kindness and manliness to Ruth, a member of a nation that was Israel's foe, and in that kindness founded a new house, the house of Jesse and David, the royal line that begat a Greater than David.

It was first the mingling of the blood of the Jew and the Gentile, symbolic of the cosmopolitan width of the Christian religion. It was the sign that that religion was not to be founded upon wealth, or upon social caste, but upon the large, wholesome love of the human heart. Boaz is immortal among Bible heroes for his kindness, his plain, everyday generosity, his sense of protection and care for the lonely, unprotected Moabitish girl, his dead kinsman's wife, who in her poverty gleaned in his harvest-field after the reapers. Boaz gave order to his reapers that they should allow her to glean even among the sheaves of barley, and by his large-heartedness gained a wife, and, more than that, made a place for himself in that immortal company who are renowned for naught but for being kind.

Just the art of being kind! That is the lesson. That is the characteristic of a Christian, that is the attribute of God. Kindness is the pure gold that lies in life's dusty, routine-beaten path. It can be picked up by any Boaz. Paul said, "Love is kind." C. S. C.

Freedom from the Power of Sin

FRIDAY, September 10. I Thessalonians 5: 1-11. "Appointed unto the obtaining of salvation through our Lord Jesus Christ." The salvation here alluded to is not that of forgiveness merely, but of the entire restitution of our nature to the original design and plan of the Creator. In the present passage, it is further described as "living together" with the Lord in life and death. Describing the religious experience of his beloved wife, Jonathan Edwards says that in the earlier stages she had been formerly subject to great unsteadiness in grace and frequent melancholy, but this was followed by an extraordinary self-dedication and renunciation of the world; and from that time she entered into a constant, uninterrupted rest and joy in God. She enjoyed a continual calm and serenity of soul, unceasing rejoicing in all the works of God's hands, a wonderful access to God in prayer, a daily doing and suffering everything for God, doing all as the service of love and doing it with uninterrupted cheerfulness, peace, and joy. Is it to be wondered at that a life of such constant fellowship with Jesus should produce full salvation from the love and power of sin? It is related of Dannecker, the sculptor, that he spent eight years in producing a face of Christ, and at last produced one in which emotions of love and sorrow were so perfectly blended that beholders wept as they looked on it. He was afterwards invited to produce a statue of Venus, but he replied: "After gazing so long into the face of Christ, think you that I can turn my attention to a heathen goddess?" There is no surer way of becoming free from the power of sin than living together with Christ, whether we wake in life or sleep in death. F. B. M.

"Following Jesus"

SATURDAY, September 11. Matthew 9: 9. "And He saith unto him, follow Me. And he arose and followed Him." Abraham and Moses found there was nothing lost in following the call of the Lord Jehovah. They forsook home and friends, going out, not knowing whither they went. They walked as seeing him who is invisible. Matthew had the privilege of following the personal presence of his divine Master. He surrendered business life, future prospects of wealth, distinction and honor, all for Jesus' sake. Matthew did not dream or imagine that all honor and glory in this life would come to him; that his name would be heralded to the end of time as the writer of the first Gospel. He could not see that his influence would roll on forever with the river of life and salvation flowing from the throne of God.

Are there not young people today whose ears are deaf to the call of the Master, who have no inclination, no purpose of surrendering to Christ, no time to give to Christianity, the church and the salvation of men? Their lives are devoted to present pleasure. When satiated with these, they are trying to kill time. As one has said, "They have already slaughtered golden hours enough to fill a cemetery." Their efforts are to make a luxurious living, not a life. Life is not worth living when it is all rotting with ease and lust. If their ears could be unstopped and they could listen to the sweet music of the Saviour's call when repeated by some friend or minister, "The Master is come and calleth for thee," then they might escape from themselves and be resurrected into the life eternal. A Time to Keep Cool

EVERY American regards the sinking of the Arabic as one of the most regrettable incidents of the war, the loss of two American passengers creating a new cause of trouble between Germany and this government. The situation has been rendered more acute by the tremendous pressure which has been brought to bear on the administration in Washington to cast diplomacy to the winds and break off relations with Germany, once for all.

It is an opportunity to drive the country into war which the militarist party is resolved to make the most of. That party contends that the sinking of the Arabic is Germany's answer to the last American note—the sole answer she will give—and that the only course now left for us is to take vigorous steps in support of the national honor.

It is fortunate for the country that our citizens, as a whole, are in no danger of being stampeded by this line of reasoning. They feel that the best interests of the nation should not be left at the mercy of the pro-war faction, which has tried repeatedly to involve us in the European embroglio. They know, too, that not the United States alone, but all the neutral countries, have suffered, as was inevitable, with the greater part of the world at war by land and sea. They know that while American travelers have the right to take passage on any ship, those who have a regard for their own safety and who are mindful of their country's welfare are careful not to travel on belligerent ships. Indeed, they have come to regard this as a duty which is counseled both by patriotism and common sense.

Thus far, the President has declined to yield to the warlike protestations of the militarists. He has given careful consideration to every aspect of the cases as they arose. In the case of the Arabic, he is patiently investigating all the points concerning which there is any serious question. When the bottom facts have been ascertained, it will then be in order to take up the whole matter with Germany, through the regular channels.

We heartily agree with Mr. Bryan that the time has come for the unneutral and partisan press of the country to lay its bias aside, and to join with the American people in urging the President to keep the country out of the war. The President knows that the great mass of our people do not desire war. Knowing this to be true beyond all question, let us hope that he will yield not an inch to the clamor of the militarists who, for the sake of advancing their own selfish purposes and of enriching the ring of munition speculators, would not hesitate to precipitate a crisis that might mean the sacrifice of hundreds of thousands of American lives, and the infliction of untold suffering on multitudes of innocent citizens.

The Lynching Disgrace

OUR nation—to our shame let us confess it—leads the world in the crime of lynching. In no other country which makes any pretense to civilization do we find the same frequent outbreaks of lawless violence, stripping Justice of her scepter and giving the functions of judge and jury and the power of life and death over to the mob. The horrible crime recently perpetrated in Georgia—the worst in many years—has aroused general indignation. There is reason to hope that it may lead to such action as will make the punishment of lynchers so swift and exemplary that this great national sin will ultimately be stamped out altogether in all the States, by the sternest measures available to law.

Mob justice in the past has disgraced almost every section of the Union. Professor James Elbert Cutler, instructor in political economy in Yale University and a distinguished authority on this subject, in his book on Lynch Law in America has given a graphic review of the history of lynching, covering a period of a century and a half. He has set forth in tabulated form the lynchings of several decades. From 1882 to 1903, no less than 3,337 persons (2,060 blacks and 1,169 whites) were victims of mob law, being far in excess of the number legally executed, many being lynched whose offenses the courts would have punished by imprisonment only. Among the victims during the period indicated (twenty-two years) were forty colored women and twenty-three white. While murder was the leading crime charged, with theft next and assault on women third, many were killed by mobs for arson, and for a variety of minor offenses. In the Southern states there were 2,585 lynchings as against 632 in the Western states and 120 in the Eastern states. Hardly a single state was free from the stain of lawlessness.

More recent statistics show that while the great national crime has decreased somewhat, it is still sufficiently frequent in many states to call for a concerted effort for its suppression. From 1885 to 1914 inclusive the total number of lynchings in all the states was 3,485, with the sectional ratio unchanged. The recent lynching of Leo Frank has brought the whole subject sharply before the public, not in Georgia alone, but throughout the whole country. In the South, the best sentiment is a unit in absolute condemnation of the lawless conditions which made the tragedy possible, and there is insistent demand that Governor Harris and the Georgia officials wipe out the disgrace by hunting down and punishing the murderers. Frank was tried and convicted of the murder of Mary Phagan and was duly sentenced to death. Governor Slaton, after a careful investigation of the evidence, found what he regarded as the basis for "a reasonable doubt," and in the exercise of his constitutional prerogative commuted Frank's sentence to imprisonment for life. He had an unquestioned right to do this, and there the case should have been permitted to rest. But incendiary appeals were kept up persistently, resulting in the plot to break into jail. This should have been foreseen and due precautions taken against a mob assault. But the way was open, the jail officials were easily overcome, and the threat of lynching was only too successfully carried out. Lawlessness, in its ghastliest form, was once again triumphant.

Georgia has a stern duty to perform, from which, in justice to itself, to the South and to the whole nation, it cannot shrink. It must hunt down and punish the actual criminals, and those who instigated and abetted the crime. It is said, in attempted justification, that the Marietta mob was not the common riff-raff, but was composed of leading citizens, men prominent in business and in social and church circles. If this be true, then so much the worse. There can be no excuse for those whose intelligence and standing should have served to increase their obligation to maintain law and order and to protect the welfare of society. Moreover, if it be true, as reported, that the perpetrators have assumed an attitude of defiance, then Governor Harris is under the greater compulsion to assert promptly and vigorously the supremacy of the law and the duty of every citizen of the state to respect it, the well-to-do and influential as well as the poorest and most illiterate among them.

If the governor does his duty fully and fearlessly, he will not only be rendering the highest service to his own state, but the whole country will welcome such demonstration of the law's punitive power as will remove the humiliating stain which this shameful outrage has placed upon American civilization.

The Sorrow of Texas

THE sympathy of the people of all the states goes out to Texas, visited again by fatal floods. Together with this grief must come satisfaction that, though the storm was evidently fully as severe as that of 1900, the loss of life has been incomparably less. In the other flood, eight thousand perished; in the present, probably less than four hundred. The former disaster was limited to the city of Galveston; now the loss of life in that city is reported to be scarcely more than a score. This difference is due to the great sea wall built after the other flood. Though a thousand feet of this wall were washed away, it held back the floods and saved the city's thousands. Property losses in Galveston and at other points along the coast are very heavy.

The big sister state has bravely met disaster before, and her vigor, thrift and courage will soon replace these losses. The wounds caused by death are harder to heal. Those who are now mourning their dead have the sympathy of the entire nation, and the prayers of the Christian Herald family rise that the consolations of the Almighty Father may be theirs.

Welcoming the Word

I WISH to thank you for the little book you gave me," said a wounded soldier in a French hospital. "It has helped me. Many of my comrades before the war were irreligious; but since they came here, their sufferings, and especially the Gospel you distribute, have brought many nearer to God, and I am so thankful for that." Another soldier—a young fellow—on receiving the gift of a Testament, said to the American Bible Society colporteur: "That is the Book of Peace you are giving us. It will surely help us." These little scenes of gratitude are occurring daily by the thousand in the military camps and hospitals, and in the trenches in Russia, Belgium, France, Germany, Austria and Italy, where large numbers of Bibles, Testaments and Scripture portions are being distributed among the soldiers. In France, from one section, reports come of the distribution of 7,245 Bibles and 8,613 portions; in a limited locality in Italy, 233 Bibles, 1,225 Testaments and portions were given away; one worker reports 6,000 Gospels and Testaments to the troops in weeks, among the recipients being Russians, Poles, and Austrians. Another gave in Austria to eager soldiers, 345 Bibles, 227 Testaments and portions. A pastor in Germany, Rev. C. H. Hardt, reports distributing 30,000 Testaments to soldiers. From Switzerland, with Geneva as distributing center, 7,043 Bibles, Testament and Gospels have been sent by the American Bible Society to the soldiers of France, Germany and Belgium, in hospitals and in prison camps. The reports, however, represent only a part of the work of Bible distribution that is now going on. In every instance, the gift of Gospel cheer is welcomed. Thus even amid the stress of war, men are being won back to the old faith and made to feel the reality of God and the consoling power of the Christian religion.

A Victory for the People

THE Constitutional Convention in session at Albany, New York, killed by a vigorous vote of 70 to 38 the proposed amendment forbidding the legislature from making laws in favor of any special class of the people of the state. As pointed out recently in the Christian Herald, such an amendment would have made impossible such progressive legislation as the Workingmen's Compensation Law, the Mother's Pension Bill, etc., recently passed.

The whole matter deserves special mention not only to record the victory won by those who are working for social justice but for the sake of recording some of the remarkable statements made by both sides during the debate on the amendment. Former Attorney-General Wickersham, speaking against the measure and disputing Mr. Barnes's contention that welfare legislation tended to produce a race of dependents and that America must strive to uphold her fundamental principle, equality, said: "We are dealing with a constitution for ten million living, breathing men and women, who in strength, in health, in sickness and in need, must look to the organized agencies of society to help them from the consequences of failure, whether it be the result of physical breakdown or other causes." Justice Carwater, who supported Mr. Barnes, said: "Among the greatest problems of futurity is a careful guarding of the rights of the individual against the oppression of the majority." It rather looks as though the people, in that sentence, let the cat out of the bag. A democracy believes in the majority, exists for the majority. The forces back of that defeated amendment seem to have been afraid of the majority. Society need no protection against the majority. History shows one generation to generation, in all lands of the earth, an oppression of the majority by the minority, and such schemes as that proposed for the Empire state and happily quashed, are part of a great attempt to keep the oppressing minority in power.

This is the day of the people. Senator Wagner declared to the supporters of the measure: "You are out of touch with present-day conditions and with the very theory of our government. All the progress our government has made, all the enlightenment our people are enjoying, came from the social-justice legislation passed during the last five years, which it is now proposed to prevent the legislature from enacting in the future. From 1911 to 1914 we had the most effective advance in progressive labor legislation that we have ever enacted in this state. It lifted New York from the last state in the Union in protecting our laboring people right up to first place."

Other states may dispute Senator Wagner's claim that New York stands first in granting rights to labor, but all will rejoice that the scheme to block future progress toward greater justice for all her people has been overthrown.

Comment by the Way

—COMPARATIVELY FEW pastors make adequate efforts to reach the children to the church, and in this important oversight lies the secret of the gradual decline of many a congregation. "Of the best way to bring back the parents" writes Dr. William Rolston Nicoll, "is to lay hold on the children. As a rule the parents will appreciate the earnestness of the minister and the teachers. There is a true saying that, whenever you lay your hand on a child's head, you lay it on a mother's heart. We must therefore go out to seek. There is not a minister or a teacher who has not the power to bring at least one child into the worshiping assembly. When the children are brought in, their presence must be remembered. It is a difficulty with not a few ministers that they cannot easily reach the children. Well, that is a difficulty which must be overcome. To speak plainly, a minister who cannot teach children or who has mistaken his vocation. Here is a practical and valuable hint for pastors. We ourselves have known not a few churches that have been largely 'made over' through giving attention to the children."

$950,000 Post Office Opened

THE new Grand Central Terminal Railway Post Office in New York, equipped with a wonderful assortment of elaborate machinery for handling the mail, was turned over to the postal authorities on August 14. This depot, in reality a gigantic parcel-post distributing station, is the first of the kind in the country. The new post office occupies a two-story building that covers an entire city block, between Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth Streets, Lexington Avenue and Depew Place, and cost $950,000. On the main floor thousands of bags of mail, to and from twenty-five states and Canada, are sorted by machinery. There is a system of belts that convey the bags all over the floor and finally to the chutes that lead into the side doors of the mail cars. Bags of mail, arriving at the terminal either by wagon or train, are placed on a mechanical device that lifts them to the top floor, where postal clerks sort them. Then they are dropped down to a raised platform and from there thrust onto the belts that convey them to other parts of the building, or to wagons or cars. Our United States mail service is a credit to the nation. It is going way back from it to primitive mail-carrying by the postman afoot, or on some animal's back. This is this method of government mail-carrying recorded in the letters sent from one king to another: "At that time Berodach-balzan, the son of Baladan, king of Babylon, sent letters and a present unto Hezekiah; for he had heard that Hezekiah had been sick."—II Kings 20:1.

Rats Carriers of Disease

THE United States Public Health Service conducted experiments in New Orleans recently to discover what relation rats have to the spread of plague. The experiment placed rats in the same catalogue with flies, mosquitoes, ticks and other insects as carriers of disease. Several hundred captured rats were marked for purposes of identification by having their ears pinned; care was taken not to render them conspicuous, as fellow-rodents wage relentless warfare on the rat that appear different from the kind. They were then released in the heart of the city, and allowed to shift for themselves. Trapping was carried on in all sections and each rat was labeled as to the locality in which he was caught. Fully one-quarter of the rats made widespread excursions, and were captured from one to four miles from where they were liberated. In one instance a rat traveled nineteen blocks, crossing one of the widest and busiest streets in the city where there were no subterranean passages, and was taken within sixty hours from the time of its liberation. One-half of all the rodents liberated were recaptured. Spiritual diseases, too, are spread by migration. They are among the perils of social life. Wherever they are, however they come, there is One who can cure them—the One "who forgiveth all their iniquities; who healeth all thy diseases; who redeemeth thy life from destruction."—Ps. 103:3, 4.

Heredity in Life Development

LHER BURBANK, the plant specialist, made an address recently in San Francisco before the second National Conference for Race Betterment on "Evolution and Variation, with the Fundamental Purpose of Sex." He said: "Abundant, well-balanced nourishment and thorough culture of plants and animals will produce good results; but the seed itself must be good to produce the best development." Only by the constant selection of the best can any race be improved. Science is constantly revealing the marvellous and fearful fact of heredity, and the laws with reference to it. We march down into our children, making them wear our features, exhibit our characteristics and relive our lives. We can transmit by heredity as well as natural habits. How necessary, then, to have a good character, a clean heart and a holy life, for the benefit of our children as well as ourselves! This law of heredity illustrates this Bible truth: "None of us liveth to himself." (Rom. 14:7.)

Temple Discovered in Egypt

THE discovery of a great temple at Memphis, in Egypt, belonging approximately to the period of Rameses II, is announced by the University of Pennsylvania Museum. The discovery is the result of the explorations of the Eckley B. Coxe expedition, under the leadership of Dr. Fisher, curator of the Egyptian section of the University Museum. It is expected that the spade will reveal still more of the greatness the glory of which Herodotus described so perfectly. It is claimed that Memphis was a city of importance

MAMMOTH MOONSHINE DISTILLERY FRAUDS

AN ILLEGAL distillery at Fort Smith, Arkansas, has been defrauding the government of the United States of an enormous amount of revenue, reaching in the aggregate, it is claimed, as high as $20,000,000. The plant has eight mash-tubs, with a capacity of 10,000 gallons each. It has eight sections and ran off a barrel of 200-gallon capacity of whisky every eight to ten minutes. A twenty-day run, officials say, netted a profit of $185,000. On March 11, 1911, the company advised the government that it had suspended operations. The Revenue Department withdrew the gauger and sealed the doors of the plant. After remaining closed for a few months, the still began turning out thousands of gallons of wildcat product, the government charges. Frauds in the manufacture and sale of intoxicants are no new thing. The Webb-Kenyon Interstate Commerce bill, recently gone into effect, forbidding the illicit transfer of drink from wet into dry territory, has cut off one-third of all the liquor business of the nation. A third of the business of the country was fraudulent. The liquor business in its manufacture and sale, legal and illegal, is a great national sin. And the climax of the shameful business is the partnership of the United States Government with it. The divorce of the Russian Government from vodka ought to shame us, and prompt imitation of her example. Our official sale of national virtue and happiness for cold dollars and cents has so outraged the conscience of the nation that it has decreed that the partnership must end. The people are determined that Uncle Sam shall go out of the liquor business—that he must take off his white apron and stop keeping bar. The friends as well as the enemies of the liquor traffic are getting to believe that it will be totally destroyed in the near future by a national constitutional prohibitory law. This curse of the prophet is echoed in the anger of our present enlightened Christian civilization. "If we refuse him that speaketh his word, then shall his wrath be kindled against us, and he will stretch out his hand against us, and smite us, and bring us down, and will destroy us from the land."—II Th. 2:16.

8,000 years ago, and that the time of Rameses—over 3000 years ago—suggested by the discovery of the temple) was the climax of the city's glory. The land of Rameses is supposed to be Goshen, or a district in Goshen. The new tomb discovered will call to mind these words: "And Joseph placed his father and his brethren, and gave them a possession in the land of Egypt, in the best of the land, in the land of Rameses, as Pharaoh had commanded." (Gen. 47:11.)

Runaway Daughter Returns Home

A LAWYER of prominence in a New England city had a beautiful and attractive daughter, whose mother subjected her to the restraints that were proper and safe. She became restless of those restraints, and made up her mind she would get out from under them. Her father put her on a train for New York to visit relatives there. She thought that would be a good opportunity for her to run away from home, and see some of the sights in the great city, which had been denied her. She changed her ticket at the New Haven station from New York to Boston, and made several "stop-overs" on her way to that city. Her parents were almost crazed when they found she had not reached her destination. All kinds of horrible things went through their minds. The case attracted more attention than it deserved, because the father telegraphed to the police authorities of many of the cities, asking their help in a search for the daughter. This pathetic letter was given broadcast to the press. "Baby: Your father and mother are heartbroken over your disappearance and are waiting anxiously for you to come home. If you see these words, come home at once, or communicate with the police and ask them to bring you to your parents. Don't be afraid to come home. We are not angry and will not blame you for anything. Only we want to see you back. Mother and father are crying for you. You don't want your mother to die heartbroken. Lovingly, Mama and Papa." How beautiful this letter, and how well-nigh omnipotent it is in its love! It is not said that she had any home grievance, nor that she wanted to be bad; she simply said she wanted to see the "movies," and the plays, and the dances, the sights of the "white light" districts. She was afraid of New York's "great white way" and concluded to take in Boston. She had inner principle to revolt at the things she saw, and to make her feel—what most tempted girls do when they come to their senses—that home was the sweetest place on earth; and the letter of her parents melted her heart, and brought her back home again. Christ takes this very thought of the wandering child, and the parental anxiety and love for it, to express the joy of the heavenly Father's heart at the return of the prodigal: "This my son was dead, and is alive again. He was lost, and is found. And they began to be merry." (Luke 15:24.)

Aids Schools and Churches

IN Western Kansas there lives a modest man who is conducting a foundation of his own which has endowed splendid libraries in the public schools of five counties, and has provided for the perpetual care and improvement of all the churches and parsonages of Garden City, where he lives. The name of the man is George W. Finnup, one of the most successful farmers and wealthiest men in Southwest Kansas. Some time ago he determined to devote his money and time to making his section of the state a better place in which to live. He could think of nothing more important than the mental and moral training of the children and young people. The public furnished the textbooks if the family was too poor to do so, the district supplied the building, the blackboards and the teacher. One essential he saw was lacking: a good library. So he made a proposition to every county school in Finney County that he would donate a sum of money if it would match it, with which to furnish an up-to-date library. Every district in the county accepted the proposition. The plan worked so well that he extended the proposition to five other counties in that section of the state. All accepted it with avidity, and now the country children have as fine general reading as do the children of the cities. The district boards appoint a committee charged with the responsibility of selecting the books. Mr. Finnup stipulates that the books shall include history, science, general literature, etc., and that they shall be essentially clean in their moral thought and sentiment. Believing that religion is essential to the happiness and prosperity of a community, he laid away an endowment fund with which to keep up the church property, the parsonage and church building of every religious society in Garden City, his home town. He claims that well painted, properly repaired buildings and nicely kept grounds are an education to a community, and he offers to make a perpetual contribution to this department of church work. The foundation of this modest man, though not on so colossal a scale as those of Mr. Carnegie and Mr. Rockefeller, is quite important. In this rushing, money-getting age it is refreshing to find a man who will turn his attention to the things of the spirit. To the end of time his service in the education of the young and in maintaining the church will be felt. With his money and time he emphasizes the essential fact that education and religion are indispensable to the culture of the young and the prosperity of the state, and he made "the well-spring of wisdom as a flowing brook." (Prov. 18:4.)

THE WAR IN EUROPE

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to L'Indépendance Belge

THE capture of the fortress of Kovno August 17, strategically considered, is the most important event which has taken place in the eastern campaign in the last three months, and the event to which the drive in Galicia, the recapturing of Lemberg and Przemyśl, and the taking of Cholm, Lublin and Warsaw were so many stepping-stones.

This capture, in the first place, completely cuts the Russian north and south lines of communication, in that it throws open the road to Wilna, a most important railroad center, control of which means the control of the Warsaw-Petrograd Railroad and all its important branches and thus limits Petrograd's communication with the rest of the empire, so far as the great arteries of communication are concerned, to the line running east to Moscow.

This lack of easy communication with the rest of the empire will shortly become of extreme importance in its influence on the defense of Petrograd and Kronstadt, against which two cities an attack appears certain to be launched by the Germans. Kronstadt, the great Russian naval port, must be taken, if taken at all, from its land side, owing to the extreme strength of its seaward defenses. The only value of the capture of Petrograd would be the sentimental advantage of driving the enemy from his capital. In the case of Kronstadt, however, the capture would have the practical value of destroying the naval base of the Russian Baltic fleet, and thus to all intents and purposes ensuring its ultimate destruction.

The second strategic effect of the capture of Kovno is to render it impossible for the Russians, in any event, to hold their second line of defense, the line Riga-Kovno-Brest-Litovsk. The third and most important strategic result is that the capture of Kovno, in connection with the movements which will follow as a matter of course and without the possibility of prevention by the Russians, has split the Russian army in two; the lines of retreat which must be adopted by the two halves are divergent, and as a result each step of any retreat undertaken (and retreat is obligatory) will increase the distance separating the two halves, and make impossible their being brought together again.

The northern half, that north and northeast of Kovno, is not for the moment in a precarious position, but the Russian forces composing the southern half, those south and southeast of Kovno, are in a situation of the greatest danger and one from which the possibilities of escape seem very small.

We will discuss the events of the past week in this campaign, adopting a line drawn east and west of Kovno as being the most convenient method of dividing the campaign.

First, however, the capture of Kovno itself must be disposed of. From the latter part of last week it was evident that this very strong fortress was doomed. Day by day the encircling German army drew nearer to the main fortress, each day being marked by the taking of some of the outlying defenses. Finally, on Saturday, the Germans got into a position from which they could bring their heavy artillery to bear, and from this moment the result was a foregone conclusion. Such of the garrison and the defending Russian forces as escaped retreated to the east across the Niemen, blowing up the bridges, and endeavored to prevent the Germans from crossing this river, but were unable to do so and were obliged to begin a general retreat toward Wilna and the eastward.

North of the east-and-west line through Kovno in Courland, the temporary halt in the movement of the German armies eastward has ended. General von Bulow's forces late last week fought and defeated the Russians on the Penewiesh-Dunaburg railroad to the east of Penewiesh, and are now reported as being in the vicinity of Dunaburg, Jacobstadt and Friedrichstadt, the latter two towns being important places on the Riga-Dunaburg railroad.

South of Riga the situation has been quiet all the week, the Germans seeming content to hold their positions at Mitau and Eckau, without making any effort to advance, which is also the case to the east of Riga. Probably no attempt will be made to take Riga itself until all the Russian warships in the Gulf of Riga have been cleared out, in which operation no apparent progress has been made in the past week.

South of the east-and-west line through Kovno, to traverse and quite impossible for artillery and trains.

There are other railroads radiating from Brest-Litovsk, north and south and to the west, but as all of these, except the road to Bieloostok to the north of Brest, have been in German hands for some time, retreat by these lines is impossible. It is into this impasse that for the last week the German armies have been steadily driving the Russian armies formerly operating on the line of Kowel-Cholm-Lublin-Warsaw-Ostrowa-Lomza, and each day has seen the circle of steel drawn closer. Finally, at the end of the week, the Germans on the south and southeast are at the line of exterior defenses of the fortress, to the west have reached and captured the fort of Rokitno, and to the northwest and north their line curves from Rokitno through Janow, and across the Brest-Litovsk-Bieloostok Railroad to the east.

As a consequence this Russian army, some six to seven hundred thousand strong, is jammed into an area of only a few square miles, surrounded on three sides and subjected to ceaseless artillery and infantry attack, and with only one insufficient line of retreat open. Some two hundred thousand or so may be able to take refuge in the fortress itself progress except towards Riva on the Garda. For their part, the Austrians seem content to remain on the defensive and give no signs of seeking to take an offensive anywhere on the Italian front.

Exchange has continued its gyrations during the week, sterling one time falling to 4.64, but afterwards somewhat recovering. A large British loan will probably be issued in New York in the near future.

The campaign in the Dardanelles both on land and sea, has been considerably more animated this past week. At the preceding week the fleet bombarded the forts and at the same time the was a general attack made by the allied forces on the Turkish land positions. The action by the fleet did not last long, it is noteworthy in being the first attack by the fleet, as a fleet, in some time; even the fear of the submarines is somewhat passing. The results achieved, far as we know them, were rather important. On land, the fighting was severe, and the Allies made some gains, particularly on the Krithia front, where an advance of some five hundred feet was made and maintained.

Early this week the Turks succeeded in torpedoing a British transport, the Royal Edward, filled with troops, in the Aegean Sea, about a thousand lives being lost. This is the first time since the war began that a British transport has been successfully torpedoed, although it has been tried several times. In view of the large number of men who have been moved from place to place in transport, and the very large number of voyages the transports have made, the record is an extraordinary good one. The British submarine which is cruising the Sea of Marmora late last week sunk two Turkish vessels, one a transport, but how many lives were lost is not known.

Most of the week the eastern campaign was a series of isolated artillery duels, with here and there an unimportant infantry skirmish. About the middle of this week, however, the French attacked briskly and in force on the Artois line, from Ablain to Arras, with aims of some importance. The most noticeable of these gains was at Ablain itself, where they captured the cross-roads giving control of the main highway from Ablain to Lens. This success was repeated just north of Arras, where the German advance trenches were taken. These movements appear precursory to the resumption of a general offensive, the French, possibly undertaken with a view to force a relaxation of the German pressure on Russia.

THE activities of the submarines during the week culminated August 19 in the sinking of the White Star liner Arabic off the Irish coast, only one day out on her west-bound trip. The big vessel carried 181 passengers and a crew of 24 persons; 26 Americans are said to have been aboard. Passengers are reported as having been watching the torpedoing of another ship at about 9:15 in the morning, when suddenly the submarine directed her attention to the Arabic. Complete reports are not yet available, but press despatches state that the boat sank in eleven minutes, the great majority of those aboard her escaping in small boats; forty of the crew and five passengers (two of them American) are reported drowned, and nine other passengers missing. The survivors were picked up by other vessels and taken to Queenstown, many of them it is stated badly injured. The first reports were received at Washington with some concern, but members of the administration are withholding comment until receipt of official accounts with particulars.

THE WHITE STAR LINER ARABIC AND HER COMMANDER, CAPTAIN WILLIAM FINCH

there has been great activity, principally centered on the great fortress of Brest-Litovsk. However, before proceeding to discuss the events around this center we will cast a glance at what has taken place at the fortress of Novogeorgievsk, to the west of Warsaw.

At the time the Russian lines to the west of Warsaw were driven in, it will be remembered that a strong garrison, some forty or fifty thousand, was left in the extremely strong fortress of Novogeorgievsk in the hope that, operating from this base, these would be able to hold back the advancing Germans, and if this proved impossible that they would at least be able to interrupt their lines of communication and harass their lines by frequent sorties. This hope, however, proved vain, as the Germans surrounded the stronghold and have held its garrison innocuous. Its surrender, with thousands of troops and great military stores, was announced on August 21. Later the Kaiser and staff entered the town and congratulated the German forces.

Brest-Litovsk lies on the Bug River, directly east of Warsaw, and is the center toward which, since the fall of Warsaw, the German armies have been driving the Russians. From Brest-Litovsk to the east, there is only one practical line of retreat, a railroad which runs as a single line to Shabinka, where it divides into two lines, one running northeast to Minsk and the other almost directly east towards Gomel. The country to the east is an enormous marsh, the so-called Prinsk marshes, almost impossible for an army and there be besieged, but what is to become of the remainder of this army can only be conjectured. Brest-Litovsk bids fair to be the scene of a military disaster, on a far greater scale than that of Sedan; even in the view of the military critic of the London Times, as cabled to us today (August 20), this disaster has practically taken place and is the most colossal in history. The German forces now hold very close to a hundred thousand square miles of Russian territory, about equivalent to the combined areas of New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania.

Aircraft have been active during the week. There have been several Zeppelin raids, one on the east coast of England and one on the outskirts of London, the particulars of which have not been received here.

The Balkan situation still defies analysis. Venizelos has consented to become premier of Greece again, but up to the present time has not outlined his policy. Bulgaria and Rumania have wrapped themselves up in the mantle of a mysterious silence, and the Serbian Parliament does not seem over-anxious to make the territorial concessions demanded of it. It is stated that Italy has ordered Serbia to evacuate those portions of Albania she has occupied, and has sent troops to back up her demands, which action adds a new complication.

The Austro-Italian campaign has been very quiet. The Italians, in spite of strenuous efforts, have been unable to pierce the Isonzo line, and on the rest of the front are making little, if any,

DIGEST OF THE NOTE TO AUSTRIA

ON AUGUST 15, the State Department in Washington forwarded to our ambassador in Vienna a statement in reply to the Austro-Hungarian official note of the 29th, in which that government made a formal protest against the exportation of arms and munitions by the United States.

The American note is in certain respects a very remarkable one. At the outset, it makes it clear that the government does not intend to stop exports of war munitions. Secretary Lansing declares that this government cannot go beyond the long-recognized rules governing such traffic by neutrals, and that it recognizes no obligation "to modify the rules of international usage on account of special conditions," as the Vienna note suggested. To adopt the attitude suggested by the Imperial Government, he declares, "would involve a neutral nation in a mass of perplexities which would obscure the whole field of international obligation, produce economic confusion and deprive all commerce and industry of legitimate fields of enterprise, already heavily burdened by the avoidable restrictions of war."

The American note then calls attention to the fact that Austria-Hungary and Germany, during the years preceding the present war, produced a great surplus of munitions and sold them to belligerents, in no case applying the principle for which the Vienna note now contends. During the Boer War, they sold munitions to Great Britain, while the Boers, being practically isolated by seas, could not avail themselves of the same privilege. Similarly, arms and supplies were sold to Russia during the Crimean War, to Turkey during the war between that country and Italy, and to the Balkan belligerents during the wars in recent years. In view of these circumstances, the American note says, "this government is reluctant to believe that the Imperial Government will ascribe to the United States a lack of impartial neutrality in continuing its legitimate trade in all kinds of supplies."

Further, the American note explains that since the foundation of this Republic it has always advocated and practiced "unrestricted trade in arms and military supplies." It has never been its policy to maintain in time of peace a large military establishment or "arms and munitions sufficient to repel invasion by a well-equipped and powerful enemy." It has desired to remain at peace with other nations and to avoid even the appearance of "menacing such peace by the threat of its armies and navies. In consequence of this standing policy the United States would, in the event of attack by a foreign power, be at the outset of the war seriously, if not fatally, embarrassed by the lack of arms and ammunition and by the means to produce them in sufficient quantities to supply the requirements of national defense. The United States has always depended upon the right and power to purchase arms and ammunition from neutral nations in case of foreign attack. This right, which it claims for itself, it can not deny to others." A nation which relies upon international obligations and international justice to preserve its integrity might easily become the prey of an aggressive nation—one which increased its military strength during peace, with conquest in view—unless the nation attacked could go into the world's munition markets and supply itself with the means of defense. The American note further declares that the general adoption of the principle suggested in the Vienna note—that neutral powers prohibit the sale of arms to belligerents—would result in transforming every nation into an armed camp, ready for aggression and tempted to assert their rights by force rather than by the appeal to reason and justice. It would "force militarism on the world and work against universal peace."

Most readers will regard as remarkable and altogether unexpected the official admission in the American note of the nation's helplessness against possible aggression. If our condition be such as the secretary describes, the question must naturally arise in the reader's mind, "Why send arms and munitions abroad at all if they are really needed here?" Perhaps the most surprising point in the note is that it completely reverses the policy of two years ago, when President Wilson, in his address before Congress, said:

"I shall follow the best practice of nations in the matter of neutrality by forbidding the exportation of arms and munitions of war of any kind from the United States to any part of the Republic of Mexico—a policy suggested by several interesting precedents and certainly dictated by many manifest considerations of practical expediency."

THE WAY TO MAINTAIN PEACE

THE sinking of the Arabic and the resultant outcry on the part of a section of the press for action at Washington have elicited from ex-Secretary of State William J. Bryan the following brief and timely statement addressed to the public:

"I have read the editorial opinions concerning the sinking of the Arabic as nos opinions were reproduced in Saturday morning's papers, but they seem to avoid the most important question. The real question is not whether mean citizens have, under international law, a right to travel through the war zone on the ships of belligerent states. That is admitted. The question now is whether an American citizen should put his convenience or venal rights above his nation's welfare. If American citizens refuse to consider their own safety or the safety of the nation, then a second question rises, namely, whether the government should permit a few persons to drag the country into this unparalleled war.

"Our government has made its protest, and there is no doubt that the position taken is abundantly supported by precedent, but that does not necessarily mean that we are going to war. Diplomacy has not yet concluded its work, and even if diplomatic efforts fail, we have recourse to the treaty plan which must be resorted to in case of disputes with Great Britain, France, Italy and Russia, and should be resorted to before going to war with any other belligerent nation.

"If the treaty plan fails, we still have a choice between entering this war and the postponement of final settlement until peace is restored. In the meantime, it will be well to think of the thousands, or possibly the hundreds of thousands, who would be sacrificed if we enter this war. These brave men are certainly entitled to consideration as well as the few who, by deliberately incurring unnecessary risks, bring harm upon themselves and danger to their country.

"It is time for the unneutral portion of the press of the United States to lay aside its bias and unite in helping the President to keep the country out of war. The pro-ally papers are insisting upon war with Germany for the benefit of the Allies, and the pro-German papers are insisting upon an embargo on arms and ammunition for the benefit of Germany. If these two groups of papers would join together and urge measures to restrain American citizens from going into the danger zone on belligerent ships, and prohibiting American passenger ships from carrying arms and ammunition—if they would do this, they would aid in preventing war and in reserving for our Nation the priceless opportunity to act as peace-maker when the time for peace arrives."

YUAN SHI KAI'S DREAM OF EMPIRE

HE APPARENTLY PLANNING TO RETURN TO MONARCHY TWO YEARS HENCE

AFTER little more than three years' experience as a republic the definite note of warning comes by the cable from Peking that China is on the verge of returning to a monarchical form of government. Yuan Shi Kai, president of the republic, and the "strong man" of China has consulted with his adherents and a semi-official announcement was made in the capital on August 16 that he would be crowned Emperor within two years from this date. This revelation to the ancient order of things does not come wholly as a surprise. Yuan as a powerful supporter of the Manchus stood stanchly by it till the last. He possessed the confidence of all classes, he was chosen as president, succeeded the provisional president, Sun Yat-sen. Under Yuan's rule, which at first was liberal, the nation has moved slowly back to its ancient standards. His four-year term was extended for a period of ten years; Confucian worship was restored and the idol worship had accomplished in the freedom of national progress was annulled by successive steps, as a part of which has the aspect of a settled program for the restoration of the ancient form of government. Great changes are impending and may be expected to develop, within the next two years, such a transformation as may affect not only political conditions throughout the whole country, but religious and educational conditions also. Much light is thrown on the present situation in the letter printed below, from a well-informed missionary who has been an unusually close observer of passing events in the oldest nation and the youngest republic in the world.

Liuchoufu, Kwangsi, South China.

THE world was startled and the Christian Church rejoiced when in April, 1912, Yuan Shi Kai, president of China, set apart a day of prayer and called upon the Christian nations of the world to bow before the throne of heaven and implore God's blessing to rest upon the new republic of China in its formative period.

At that time some writers of a sanguine turn of mind could almost see the millennium established in the Far East. Since then, however, the tide has turned. Slowly those first good impulses have been crowded out, and the smoldering aspirations for better things have been gradually smothered, until today we find the new republic that was established with such promise gradually drifting back to the conditions that existed under the old Manchu régime. This decline was almost imperceptible at first, but recently the backward pace has been accelerated until its velocity has been express-like in the rapidity of its decline.

Two parties seem to be striving for the supremacy: the Progressives and the Conservatives. Many of the former party have been educated in Europe or America, and stand for progress and reform. When the new republic was established, many of these men were put in positions of responsibility and trust; and for a while it looked as if missionary work would receive a great impetus. It was not long, however, before many of these men, one by one, were dismissed from office and men of the old conservative type were put in their places. Many of this latter class are venerable old fossils, who cling tenaciously to the past and past ideals.

In 1912, when the five-striped flag was first unfurled by the revolutionists at Wuchang, Yuan Shi Kai was asked to throw his influence with the revolu-

Doughnuts Delicious

They are more easily and more successfully achieved with Crisco than with lard.

They do not leave the "greasy" taste that so often marks the lard-cooked product.

They are crisp, sweet, tempting.

CRISCO
For Frying • For Shortening
For Cake Making

Doughnuts fried in Crisco absorb considerably less of Crisco than they would of lard.

Such Crisco as is absorbed is of superior purity and digestibility.

Persons to whom doughnuts fried in lard are "forbidden fruit" often find it possible to eat such dainties without discomfort when they are made with Crisco.

Plain Doughnuts

3 teaspoonfuls Crisco	1/2 teaspoonful salt
3/4 cupful sugar	2 to 1 teaspoonful spices, (mace, cinnamon or nutmeg, or 1 of each)
3 eggs	6 tablespoonfuls milk
3 cupfuls flour
3 teaspoonfuls baking powder

Cream the Crisco, add the sugar gradually, creaming after each addition. Then add the beaten eggs. Mix and sift the dry ingredients. Add alternately with milk to first mixture. Mixture should be very soft. Form into a ball, place on a well-floured board and roll to one-half inch thick. Cut and fry in Crisco hot enough to brown a one-inch cube of bread a golden brown in sixty seconds.

(Use level measurements)

If you want to know more about Crisco and the conditions under which it is prepared, send for the "Calendar of Dinners". This cloth-bound, gold-stamped book contains, besides the story of Crisco, a different dinner menu for every day of the year and 615 recipes gathered and carefully tested by the well-known catering authority, Marion Harris Neil. Address Dept. 8-9, The Procter & Gamble Company, Cincinnati, O., enclosing five 2-cent stamps. A paper-bound edition, without the "Calendar of Dinners" and with 250 recipes is free.

tionary party, but declined, and for months held out for a limited monarchy and a recognition of the sovereignty of the Manchu rulers.

However, when at last the republic was established, Yuan Shi Kai was chosen president. In forming the constitution, American ideals were favorably considered. The term of office for president was, as in America, to be four years, and when Yuan Shi Kai took the oath of office, he swore to honestly adhere to the constitution, and faithfully perform his duties as president of the republic.

However, changes have come. China is reverting to the old, and today everything introduced by the Kwomintang government at Nanking has been completely overturned.

It was not long before the president's powers seemed too limited, and presently a "constitutional compact" was issued. This document was regarded by his supporters as merely giving him "sufficient power to assert himself in case of need," but virtually it made him a dictator and placed full control of affairs in his hands. Such power could not be used to the best advantage by a short four-year term of office, and to make the presidential chair more comfortable, the term was extended to ten years instead of four. Finally, we saw the closing days of 1914 usher in a new presidential election law. Commenting upon this new law the North China Herald said:

"Ostensibly, any Chinese who is forty years of age, who enjoys full public rights, and has lived in the country for upward of twenty years, will be eligible for election as president. This completely cuts out Sun Yat Sen, or any other foreign-educated aspirant to the position, or rather retards them in fulfilment of their ambitions, if such lie in the direction of the presidential palace. Should that not be sufficient to bar them, then Article 3 will finally and decisively defeat them, or any one else the present occupant of the chair may not like. It provides that at each election the president, representing the people, shall nominate three candidates for the presidency. . . . And still, if the powers thus given, the sitting president are not enough to check an undesirable successor from endeavoring to secure office when the presidential ten years are up, then the state council may extend the term of the president and thereby render an election unnecessary."

The five-colored republican flag which took the place of the old dragon emblem, and which has fluttered in the breeze for three short years, is also to be relegated to the background. In its place a flag with blue and white stripes over a red ground, having an ancient emblematic meaning, is to be unfurled.

The dress of both civil and military officials is to be changed. When the new republic was established, the ancient order of official robes, with distinguishing headgear, was done away with, and many of the new officials who had been educated abroad retained their European costume. Now, however, the government is considering adopting a special form of dress for the different grades of officials which will be more in keeping with ancient form.

Old forms of punishment are being reintroduced. Among others, that formidable instrument of torture, the bamboo, after a short rest, has again been brought into use in court. The bamboo, for practical use, must be four feet long, and tapering from the handle outwards to a specified width, and may be applied in lieu of imprisonment for petty thieving, gambling, etc., to persons between the ages of sixteen and sixty.

Most serious of all is the religious retrogression. The first symptom appeared when, two years ago, there was a loud clamoring for Confucianism to be made a state religion. Ch'en Hwan Chang, the able statesman and leader of the Confucianists in Peking, led in the campaign and pressed the matter of again deifying their revered sage with such vigor that had not the Christian press of this and other lands joined in a united protest, and had not a strong petition signed by the missionaries and Christians of all denominations in the eighteen provinces been sent to Peking, it is probable that Confucius would have been set apart as the national deity.

However, although the matter failed for the time being, in order to conciliate the losing party and retain their support, when the anniversary of the birth of Confucius arrived, President Yuan Shi Kai offered public worship at the Confucian shrine, and gave orders that officials should do likewise in all his vast domain.

A further turn toward the past took place when, on December 22, in keeping with ancient custom, the president, clad in silken robes, with great pomp repaired to the Temple of Heaven, and performed the rites of worship which formerly were carried on by the Manchu rulers. For four years this noted temple had been neglected and the sacred rites ignored; and it caused great commotion when, for the first time in the history of China, heaven was worshiped by one not an emperor. Away back in the misty past, this ancient ceremony may have been the expression of a heart's yearning after God; but it is feared that now, in the face of present-day enlightenment, more stress is placed on observing hoary customs than on worshiping the Infinite.

This impression is confirmed because, according to a recent mandate, soldiers henceforth must bow and worship in the military temple, at the shrine of Kwan Yu, the god of war. Already northern soldiers have observed this order, and have bowed in reverence before the tablets of their departed heroes. Model troops who four years ago swept the idols ruthlessly from their places in the temples are now marching in ranks to these same temples and bowing in worship before the idols they once despised. A new temple is to be erected in honor of Kwan Yu and Ioh Fei, two ancient marshals of the Han and Sung dynasties.

Official opposition to preaching to the tribesmen is unfortunately developing.
This is the most lamentable event that has come to our notice. Many of the provinces of Southern China teem with aboriginal tribesmen variously called Miao, Yao, Tong, Chwany, etc. Formerly these people were much neglected by missionary effort, their inaccessibility, customs, and tribal tongues acting as barriers to the entrance of the Gospel. Of recent years, however, the English Wesleyan Mission, the China Inland Mission, and others, aided by the British and Foreign Bible Society, have made special efforts to reach these people and with encouraging results.
Notably the work among the Miao peoples of Kweichow and Yunnan have been blessed of God. Recently, in some parts, this work among the aborigines is being opposed by the government, and some entertain fears that unless changes are made, it may have grave results for the poor hill Christians in the affected districts.

After the revolution, multitudes seemed to lose faith in their idols, and many developed iconoclastic tendencies.
Temples were desecrated, and idols torn from their positions and thrown in the river or trampled under foot by jeering crowds. However, although the temples were swept of their idols, the missionary force was not adequate to take advantage of the new conditions, or to meet the opportunity for Christian teaching which the new order afforded. Gradually the old customs have been revived.
New temples have been built, old ones repaired, and the idols, once despised, have been rescued from their places of banishment, repainted, robed, and amid great pomp carried by admiring crowds to their old temple homes and again placed in the seats of honor.

At Liuchow recently an old idol that two years ago had been pulled from its ancient seat, badly battered and then thrown in the river, was recently patched up, repainted, and placed in the seat of honor in the renowned temple of the Southern Plains.
Hundreds have flocked daily to do honor.

The call for Christian workers is imperative. Opportunities once missed may be gone forever. China is turning, but whether she turns backward to idolatry, death, and eternal night, or forward into the light and liberty of a Christian nation, may depend upon the response of Christianity to her spiritual

that the difference. Or one difference. The dams of ours are built for all need in record time; how long it took how many men working under pressure to erect that Arabian one, we don't know, but we have as for believing that present-day wonders of the kind are erected by hardly fewer men and in far less need with the permanency of the old hills. Of course, the United States is not in the pace for the whole world in the matter of irrigation. In fact, it is confessed we have started rather late to do what other nations consider not elementary work. India is second with the most extensive irrigation system there is. The Assuan dam and the first cataract of the Nile, which is the very largest structure of its kind, and yet in India they are constructing a dam and storage system on the Indus River which is planned to be ten times the size of the Assuan. The reservoir created will be several hundred miles long and two hundred feet deep. It is said that over twenty million inhabitants of India are freed from starvation by its irrigation. Spain, Italy, France, and even India are well advanced in this art.

Up to get back home; though all we can do is to note a few of the notable things that are being accomplished. There is a particularly interesting specimen of Uncle Sam's watering-cans in northern Wyoming, a reservoir over 6500 acres in extent 13 feet deep at the dam. Shoshone is the highest in the world; and it's the oldest, too, I guess. It is a V-shaped wedge of masonry only two hundred feet long on top, and tapering to fit snugly in between the two great hills which at that point seem to have leaned slightly apart in order to permit a graceful little mountain stream to meander past and on into the country. But that wedge of concrete now stays the stream in its course until it becomes a great useful lake. The Shoshone project comprises 164,122 acres, 4,500 feet above sea level.

Then there is a nineteen-foot dam! But it is just short of a mile long. It diverts the Colorado River fourteen miles north of Yuma, Arizona, into two canals, one on each side of the river, and special headgates transform the muddy water into a nearly clear stream. At Yuma—this is the Yuma project—a siphon one thousand feet long, built under the river's bed, conveys the water from the main canal to bottom lands beyond. Seventy-three miles of dikes will protect the bottom lands from overflows of the river.

Instead of dams and reservoirs, in North Dakota there are the pumping projects. The Missouri has too low a fall to permit of gravity canals direct, so the water must be pumped into higher level basins, and thence distributed. The Missouri must be a very unaccommodating stream, for besides this difficulty, it presents another: unstable banks. So the pumps have to be mounted on barges and connected to the shore by flexible pipes.

I would like to speak of the great variety and abundance of crops which are being raised on the portions of these projects that are already irrigated. It pays, this irrigating. Uncle Sam says that the gross returns from cultivated acreage in the Yakima project, Washington, for 1914 and six years preceding, annually exceeded the whole cost of construction of the project. And I should also like to point out the numbers of prosperous towns that have sprung up with the arrival of water in the great American desert, and the fine condition of the thousands of farms which have been homesteaded, and the abundant opportunities for homesteading still, and the chance that this service gives to become independently prosperous; because it is all the latter things that the Reclamation Service is for. But you see how little space is left.

On September 20 there is to be a great International Irrigation Congress at the Panama-Pacific Exposition. Announcements of this congress declare that the irrigation problem is one of the most important before the nation today.

THE FABLE OF THE POISON IVY

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

ONCE upon a time, when there were witches and fairies and dragons with fiery eyes (that lived in the narrow minds of the people), there was a girl who dwelt in a little house on the edge of a fair city. She was a slender girl, with light wavy hair, and blue eyes that glittered with the coldness of ice, and a mouth that was a straight hard line and the color of a roseleaf. She lived alone in the little house, but she had many guests; for the idle women of the city who had more time than they knew what to do with would bring their sewing to her home and would sit there and talk during the long afternoons.

When the idle women who had more time than they knew what to do with would visit her, she would sit listening to them as they talked, and, sometimes, when they mentioned a name in their conversation, she would raise her eyebrows ever so lightly and twitch up the corners of her mouth in a sneery little smile. And when the idle women saw her smile, they would stop talking and glance in her direction, and at last one of them would say, perhaps defiantly, "Well, isn't she nice? Why do you look at me that way?" And the girl would laugh a little laugh as hard as sleigh-bells echoing over a frosty meadow, a laugh that was bright and musical and cold, and she would say: "Yes, she's very nice, but—" And she would laugh again.

It was not always a girl they talked about, these idle women. It was sometimes a prominent lord who lived in the city, or a great lady, or even the king and queen themselves that bore the brunt of the gossiping. And the girl who lived in the little cottage, because she was no respecter of persons or rank, would smile her little smile and would say: "Yes, she's clever, but I know—" and she would leave it unfinished. Or perchance when they talked of a great lady, she would raise her eyebrows and murmur, "Indeed she is beautiful; and not only the women think so. Oftentimes I see—" and she would laugh her hard laugh. And the idle women, after they finished their sewing, when the sun was going down to rest behind the highest hill, would walk slowly home. And in their hearts there would be a bit of an unspoken doubt about some fair lady, or great lord, or poor girl. And the doubt in their hearts would take root and grow, until finally it would be a certainty that they confided to their dearest friends, who in turn confided it to their dearest friends, until the whole great city drew aside its skirts when certain folk passed and whispered comments behind obviously raised hands.

ONCE, in the midst of a deep snow-storm, a woman came to town. Because the girl's cottage was the first she saw, the woman stumbled down upon the doorstep frosted with the cold, and asked for shelter. The girl, who never did anything unkind—with her hands—took the woman in and fed her and warmed her by the fire. And as a glow of color began to creep back into the woman's face, the girl watched her with ice-blue speculative eyes—eyes that saw every detail of the threadbare dress and ragged shoes and sad expression. But she asked no questions; she never asked questions.

The woman did not stay the night. When she was rested, she stumbled to her feet, and said that she had business in the city that she must attend to. And the girl raised her eyebrows and offered no resistance. Why should she urge a beggar woman to stay in her home, and eat more than was necessary of her food, and bask in the light of her fire? She had been kind enough.

The woman appreciated the kindness, for she had been cold indeed before she had found the cottage door, before she had seen the warm light streaming out on the snow through the little windows. As she reached the door she turned to the girl, and, in the manner of the day, raised her hands high above her head.

"You have been good to me," she said, "good as one Christian is to another. I am an old beggar woman with no gifts to give you and no worth the while to leave behind me. Only this will I say: your face and form are flower-like; you are like a beautiful growing thing in the winter. May you grow more and more like that. And the woman opened the door and was lost to sight among the falling snowflakes.

Time went on and news came that the old woman was living in the fair city. She did no work and did not pass out upon the street. She had food to eat and clothes to wear and she was evidently happy, very happy indeed. Naturally folk talked, and finally one day the idle women who were in the girl's little parlor brought up the subject; and, as always, she raised her eyebrows and smiled.

"Indeed," she said, in her old musical voice, "indeed it seems a mystery to me. The woman came away to town, at the time of her private life, and she stopped at my home for shelter and warmth and food. She was ragged and starving, and I gave her help in plenty. In return she gave me nothing, for she said she that was paid. But she told me that she had in her work that night in the great city. The girl laughed scornfully for a moment before she went on. "As you know," she said, "there have been robberies." And she left her sentence unfinished.

It was then that it happened. The door opened as if it had been struck by a gust of wind, and the woman came in and stood with accusingly baring finger on the threshold. Although her face was sad and her clothes were ragged, there was a certain dignity about her that awed the idle women into silence. With hand upraised in the falcon of the day, she faced the girl.

"I thought," she said, "that you were kind, but I find that you have a poisoned soul. I will add to your final blessing: May you grow to be like the flower, the woodland plant, at you most resemble!"

AS she stood there with her hand upraised, a wonderful thing happened. The sky grew sudden and dark, and a flash of lightning lit the room with a blue-white light. A flash of all things for a moment stood distinctly; and then, as suddenly as she had come, the woman disappeared. And the idle women who had been gossiping fled shrieking toward home. They never stopped to see what happened to the girl.

No one went near the little cottage on the outskirts of the city for months. For once the idle women had tried to repeat the story that they had seen acted before them. But one day in the early summer, they crept back to the spot they had so often visited. The cottage stood just as they had left it with the door wide, and there was no sign of occupation, but all over the little porch there grew a vine, a slender vine with graceful green leaves growing three on a stem. And the women remembered the prophecy that they had heard.

"Ah," said one of them, "is it a friend?" And with a frightened heart she reached out and touched the swelling green vine, and as she touched her hand swelled up and blisters appeared on it, and it burned and itched and smarted as many minds had burned and itched and smarted when the words had touched them. And the second time the women fled shrieking toward home.

This is the end of the legend. On that day, so the story tells, on the skirts of town and in the woods of the deserted cottages, there has a vine, beautiful and graceful and attractive, but—poisonous. And since that day folk have avoided it. It is the poison ivy.

THE WORLD'S RECORD LOW GEAR RUN

THE life of the average motor car," says a writer from a war zone, "is less than thirty days." Not referring to destruction by shot and shell, but to wear and tear—the inability of the car to hold up under hard service over rough roads.

Here for the first time, the automobile world is standing at what happens when a motor car is driven by men who cannot spare a thought for the car but only for the service they get out of it.

The biggest problem the motorist faces today is wear and tear and depreciation.

Last year these two items alone cost the car owners of America $10,000,000.

Your average owner hesitates to demand from his car all the service he has a right to expect. He is always favoring the engine, the tires, the complex system of parts and plumbing.

Taking all possible care, he still faces an unreasonable depreciation.

Car owners, patient and a bit timid at first, are asking in more insistent terms than ever What will the car do and what will it cost in upkeep and depreciation?

The Franklin Scientific Light-Weight System does away with 177 parts—piping, pump, gears and fittings—the weight of water, the danger of freezing in Winter, of boiling in Summer, of bursting pipes, leaky radiator and cracked water jackets.

Scientific Light-Weight means first of all a critical selection of materials.

For the Franklin alloy steel we pay a premium of fifty per cent, to obtain the highest quality.

The vandium cast iron in Franklin cylinders costs ten per cent more than the gray cast iron commonly used.

Owing to the grade of steel, Franklin springs cost fifty per cent more than the usual automobile springs.

The laminated wood sill of the Franklin costs fifty per cent more than the typical steel frame—but is stronger, lighter, more resilient: adds to the flexibility and comfort of the car.

If you have owned and operated any make of motor car, you have some first-hand experience with repair costs and depreciation.

The Franklin Facts about long service life can be obtained from any Franklin dealer.

Get them. They mean more to you today than ever.

Here is the hardest test an automobile was ever put to—a practical demonstration of what a Franklin Car can do, and of the great efficiency of Franklin Direct-Air-Cooling. At 5.50 o'clock on Wednesday afternoon, August 4th, this Franklin Car arrived in San Francisco at the finish—after a run of 860 miles on low gear from Walla Walla, Washington, all the way without once stopping the engine. High and Second gears were removed from the car, and the transmission sealed before the start; and the car officially inspected and affidavit made by technical observers in San Francisco. Running time, 83 hours and 40 minutes—over 10 miles an hour. The route was the hardest possible and was purposely chosen as an additional test of the dependability of the Franklin Car—through the John Day River Gorges, the Harney Desert in Southern Oregon, the Siskiyou Mountains and the Burney Pass in California.

How many motorists have ever seen a Franklin Car in the Used Car Dealers' or offered in the Sale and Exchange columns of the Sunday papers?

Franklin cars built in 1902 and 1903 are still running.

Two things are responsible for the long service life of the Franklin Car—The Franklin System of Direct-Air-Cooling, and the Franklin Scientific Light-Weight.

ELIJAH'S FLIGHT AND RETURN

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR SEPTEMBER 12.
1 KINGS, 19.

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"Be still, and know that I am God."—Ps. 46:10.

God is known by the still heart. This is good advice. Elijah would never have known God as he really is if he had always lived in the midst of the crowded cities of Israel. He needed the vast spaces of the wilderness, the awful silence of Horeb, the calm revolution of day and night proceeding in majestic silence, ere the fever of his spirit could die down and he would be able to perceive God's presence. The silt and mud must drop out of the Rhone-water before it can reflect the snow-clad mountains which surround Geneva's lake. As long as Elijah was full of Carmel's revenge and Jezebel's threat, the still small voice would speak in vain. It was very still and small, like the trembling echoes of a flute which is being played among the hills. It spoke to his deepest nature, and cast its bewitching spell over his tempest-tossed spirit, drawing him from the cave, into the inmost recesses of which he had been driven by the terrible convulsions of nature. If you want to know God, you must have the quiet heart. As long as the frenzied cries of passion or the querulous voice of murmuring complaint fill your soul, the still small voice is inaudible. Ask Him who calmed by his presence and voice the stormy waters of the lake to arise in your heart and say, "Peace, be still!" Then you will begin to know God.

Elijah's Need and His Blessing

By Arthur H. Howland

A STORY of the country, with its wildnesses, its beauties, its grandeur; a story of discouragement and refreshment; a story of a man finding and hearing God. This is our lesson today about Elijah.

Many a man has found new courage and a new vision among the woods and mountains. Modern life is far too noisy, too quick. Our nerves and brains are set at a pace that cannot be kept up without damage. It is a serious matter if we cannot occasionally get away, if only for an hour, or a night, into the stillness and roominess and among the great patiences of nature. Elijah's trouble was largely physical. He had been under a terrific strain, had doubtless lost a great deal of sleep, and the reaction from his great victory took him down into the depths of despondency. It was when his disciples were in just this condition that Jesus said: "Come ye yourselves into a desert place apart and rest awhile." Many people in a state of terrible depression think they are in bad condition spiritually, when all they need is a little sleep, a little change of scene, something to loosen the mental and nervous tension so that their minds will be able to apprehend the facts of God's nearness and goodness and care.

Elijah did a number of extremely wise things one after the other. He went into the wilderness; he sat down; then he lay down and slept. Doubtless everything looked far brighter when he woke up; but he needed further treatment.

A messenger of God came, bringing him something to eat. The Hebrew word for messenger is precisely the same as the word angel; rather, messenger and angel are two different translations of the same Hebrew word, so no one should be scolded if he prefers to think that some human being rather than a supernatural visitor came along with food for the tired and hungry prophet.

Since I began to write this lesson I had a visit from a real angel. I was at work on it, when a delicate little lady walked in—a lady known far and wide as a sweet type of the old-time religion; a brother of hers was one of the most powerful and greatly loved of the Methodist preachers of a generation ago, another brother was also a gifted preacher, and she herself, living in the present and interested in all that is going on, carries about with her the gentle sanctity that seems to belong to another age. She stepped in, talked awhile, and went out again, and I felt as if I had had a visit from an angel. Wherever she goes people have that feeling that she is a messenger from God to reflect the sunshine of his sweet presence.

Elijah was discouraged, furthermore, because he was misinformed. He thought he was the only true servant of Jehovah in all Israel. God told him there were six thousand nine hundred and ninety-nine others. Many of our troubles exist only in our own minds. That is another reason why we should occasionally get away from ourselves, get new scenes before our eyes and a lot of new thoughts in our minds. New facts will crowd out old errors, and we shall find that things are in far better condition than we thought.

But Elijah's trip to the country, his rest, his sleep, his food, his mountain journey, all these would have fallen far short of giving him the perfect restoration he needed if he had failed to have that personal, definite, intimate interview with God himself. He would not go back. He must get that final blessing for which he had come. So he went on—and on—and waited. Then, after the wind, the earthquake and the fire, came the still, small voice.

It was worth coming for, worth waiting for, worth the price of solitude and time. Worth the struggles up the craggy steeps of Horeb. He had heard God's voice—and could go back to his life and his work again to be a victor.

Many young people during the summer just past have gone to some beautiful lakeside or forest to attend a convention of Christian workers. All of them saw the natural beauties. Many of them got a real mental and physical blessing from the change and the rest and recreation. Many received intellectual uplift and stimulus. Many got new visions of duty and heard the call of various fields to earnest service. Some waited and hoped for the voice of God in their souls, but did not quite reach that spot of spiritual solitude, of abandonment, of rest, of final patience, of triumphant faith. Some, however, waited and yielded and listened and trusted—and heard. And they have come back from those mountains or lakesides to be God's prophets, God's angels this year, urging others to be true to God and to seek his presence.

The lesson includes the call of Elisha. He was a busy farmer, but God took him away from his farm to be a prophet. Amos, too, was called from a farm; Peter, James and John from the fish-nets; Matthew from his tax-collector's desk. So was Moody called from the shoe warehouse; Sunday from the baseball field; and a host more have been summoned from other tasks to be messengers of God.

It is a wonderful thing when God lays his hand upon a man's shoulder and says, "I want you." There is only one thing to do when God calls. That is to go.

Often it is not necessary to leave our other work. Many a housewife, many a farmer, many a teacher or merchant is just as truly doing God's work as those who give up all secular pursuits and devote all their time to the work of the Gospel.

To revert once more to the subject of finding God and listening to him. We must have these times of special blessing; but it is also possible, if we are trustful and obedient and wise, to live where we can feel all the time that God is with us. "Brother Lawrence," at work in his kitchen, lived a life that led him to write the great classic "The Practice of the Presence of God." Zinzendorf and Wesley thought thus, and taught a life lived in God's presence. Paul wrote of the life that is "hid with Christ in God." So many of these humble workers for God to-day, workers in farm or kitchen or factory, people who are not able to get away to mountainside or lakeside conference, who cannot go to a camp meeting, or cannot even leave their task to go on a lonely journey to find God, yet keep him in their hearts, and about their daily work, and in their waking hours at night, hear the sweet whispers of the Still, Small Voice.

Forty days and forty nights unto Horeb the mount of God." One of the accurate and unexpected facts of the Bible which serves as a base line or measurement of distances, and which beyond a peradventure that this is as imaginary journey. I have told over that whole stretch from Horeb to Jezreel on camel and horseback and my notebook registers forty miles. It could not be a straight line, for the terrified fugitives, without a guide-book, must have zig-zagged from point to point where water was found to support life. Horeb most probably means "waste," and connected with the Semitic root "to destroy"; and if there exists upon the face of this earth a desert which in its limbo and desolation can represent the waste places of creation, it is this desert of Sinai. It is the "waste" of God. We know it as Sinai, "the mountain of Law," where Moses stood two thousand years before. But long before the days of the Exodus it was known as the "mount of God," and it may well have been Elijah's early religious stirrings which impelled him to flee from the face of an angry man.

Nothing could exceed the indescribable beauties and grandeur of those granite mountains, whose unchangeable cliffs correspond finely to the everlasting walls of moral truth.

Caves are abundant in limestone countries, but few and far between in the red and gray granite of Sinai. We saw only a few in the ascent of Sinai, and one of these is named for Elijah. It is close by a little perennial, trickling spring, which is also unique in that waste of scarred mountain granite. A remarkable photograph taken from just outside the cave will be found opposite page 236 of my volume, "From the Nile to Nebo."

Horeb stands like a lighthouse on the bridge which connects three continents—Europe, Asia and Africa. Whether storms sweep from the Indian ocean, the cold plateaux of Russia, or the stormy Atlantic through the trough of the Mediterranean, the peaks of Sinai shriek and re-echo with the supreme force of the tempests. We saw no storms in Sinai, but those who have had that rare experience found that thrilling scene indescribably grand and terrific. Elijah on Horeb stands close to Moses. Nearly a thousand years later Moses and Elijah stood with Christ on the Mount of Transfiguration—a spur of Hermon. God chooses matchless theaters for matchless events.

each of those on the special list, and then another five weeks later, and others at five weeks intervals until twenty-eight letters have been sent. If the party does not buy before, eighty per cent of that firm's business comes by this method of solicitation, and eighty per cent of these come after the second visit. Such a follow-up system will produce results in any Sunday school.

Then I should get a business man if possible to act as a teacher. I was in a North Carolina town on two visits about four months apart. On the first visit the local Sunday school had two or three men mixed in with a few women in an adult class. On the second visit there was a men's class of twenty-five in the Amen corner, taught by a bank president, and they met one night a week too, as they could not finish the lesson in the time limit of the session.

Do not require the class to be present at both opening and closing exercises always, as they require more time to discuss the lesson than the rest of the school.

Organize the class with officers and a Membership, Social and Devotional Committee. Put up a worthwhile program. Give the class a big enough objective, such as brothing some big boys, supporting a Bible worker on the missionary field, doing Gospel team work in nearby towns or country communities. About sixty such teams recently in Colorado visited all parts of a sparsely settled country and won scores to Christ. That's business for Christ.

The Disciples of Christ have organized a "Men and Millions" movement. Its first aim was to secure a million dollars to be expended for foreign missionary work. Then the goal was fixed at two million, to include home as well as foreign missions. Finally a six million dollar goal was named, including all the activities of the church: missionary, evangelist and educational. Then came the plan of enlisting a thousand volunteers for home and foreign work and adding the every-member canvass as a method of finance in every unit. In a little more than two years the total amount secured was two and a quarter million dollars, while scores of young people have consecrated themselves to lives of Christian service.

The Foreign Mission Department of the Christian Church raised last year $233,833. Secretary Morill writes: "This is the best year we have ever had in our foreign missionary work. In the present year we are trying to make forward movement campaign the benefit of all the departments of denominational work, that is to say, benevolent enterprises. We are planning to secure at least half a million dollars for the purposes mentioned."

Dr. E. Schweinitz, Secretary of the German Church in America, writes: "We spent last year for our mission among the Eskimos $20,697.09; among the Indians of California $2,196.20; for all other missions of the Moravian Church $7,500; for missionary literature and all demonstration expenses $2,736.66; total $33,130."

The Evangelical Association reports missionary gifts to the amount of $34,293.67. "A heavy outlay has been required," writes Secretary Johnson, "for our war-stricken churches in Germany and Switzerland. We are not retrenching."

The Society of Friends reports $116,000 raised, an average of over one dollar per member. The society reports 110 missionaries and has several members in foreign work under the Y. M. C. A. This is an average of one missionary to every 890 members.

Throughout the summer missionary conferences of young people will be held, and on October 14 the great National Laymen's Missionary Campaign will be opened at Chicago. The chief missionary agencies in the country, home as well as foreign, are co-operating in the organization and conduct of the campaign. Seventy-five great conventions will be held throughout the United States from October to April in a campaign to culminate in a national missionary congress at Washington, April 26-30, 1916.

Thus, while the forces of strife and destruction are at work, the forces of peace and life are at their tasks. Altogether the reports for last year are inspiring and the outlook for the year ahead most hopeful.

THE PRAYER LEAGUE

A HAPPY mother writes: "Over three months ago I wrote asking your prayers for my son who had gone down to the depths, lost his position, left wife and child. I have received a letter from one of our missions from my son saying he has been converted and for three months has been leading a consistent Christian life." Another mother says, "I wrote you a few weeks ago requesting your prayers for my son, who is a physician and was addicted to the drug habit. I am truly grateful to God and the Prayer League that he is cured." Another friend writes, "My brother acknowledged answer to prayer. He was saved from the drug habit." Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have also been received from:

A Friend, Excelsior, Mo.; Elizabeth; One of God's Children; E. T., New York City, N. Y.; Mrs. L. D., Greenville, Mich.; A Reader, Belair, Md.; Miss M. C., Bridgetown, N. S.; A Prayer League Helper, Rustburg, Va.; A. D., Neche, N. D.; Mrs. P. A. B., Simsbury, Conn.; N. B. V. M., Vanderbilt, Mich.; Miss E. W. V., Kalamazoo, Mich.; A Mother, Amsterdam, N. Y.; Reader; Mother of Two Sons; Another Mother.

A young man who has planned to enter the ministry is ill with a severe nervous disorder and asks the prayers of the League for his complete recovery. Another friend writes to tell of severe mental suffering and spiritual darkness and asks our special prayers. A young mother who is afflicted with dropsy and whose physician declares she cannot recover asks the special prayer of the League that she may be restored to health, particularly that she may be able to give a mother's care to a young daughter who was in infancy consecrated to God. She also asks that her brother may be converted and her mother, who cares for her constantly, may be strengthened and blessed. A young girl, seventeen years old, suffering from and lung trouble, asks special prayer for healing. Mrs. M. M. F. writes: "Will you please unite with me in prayer for my baby daughter? She has had analysis of the lower limbs for three months. Pray that God will strengthen her little limbs that she may yet be able to walk and not always be a helpless cripple." A friend from Florida asks special prayer that liquor may be banished from her home and also a special prayer for her young son.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at Milan, Pa.; La Grange, Pa.; Pinckneyville, Ill.; Kenton, Okla.; Christiana, Tenn. (for outpouring of God's Spirit during meetings to begin September 4); Bow Island, Alta. A friend asks that financial aid may be forthcoming to help complete a church building in East San Jose, Calif.

Ten friends ask prayer for mental restoration or strengthening for friends, relatives or themselves.

Seven friends ask prayer for the restoration or strengthening of sight for relatives, friends or themselves.

Twenty-four friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven or express in other ways their desire for spiritual blessing.

Thirty-two friends ask prayer for the gratification of varied desires and needs.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S TOPICS FOR SEPTEMBER

Friendships That Are Worth Forming; Making Them, Keeping Them

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U.
Prov. 6, 8, 10, 14, 17, 19

SCHOOL days, college days have come again, and we shall be picking out our chums for the year—perhaps for life. These proverbs from the old Book give us some hints which we may find valuable this September.

Verses 5 and 6: Choose honest friends, frank friends, brave friends. Take a friend who will say to you what he ought to say, not what he thinks you want him to say, a friend who believes the old proverb: "Our best friends are those who tell us of our faults and help us to mend them." But we don't want faultfinders for friends. Some people seem to get the fault-finding habit so it is hard for them to see the good in friend or neighbor.

Verse 9: Find friends whose lives are fragrant, friends who bring out the best that is in you, who make the atmosphere wholesome and leave sweet memories when they go away.

Verse 10: Stick to the old friends. The time is coming when you will miss them, "The old, familiar faces."

Be loyal while they are near. Unless, of course, they refuse to go along with you on the paths of progress. This often happens, and causes the end of many a sweet friendship. Our first loyalty is to truth and duty, and if our friends refuse to go with us along that path we must go on alone.

Verse 14 warns against the loud-voiced friend, who overpraises us and makes so much ado about caring for us that we can hardly believe he means what he says at all.

Verse 17 reminds us of the brightening, sharpening results of friendship with people who will set their wits against ours, helping by kindly discussion, to find the truth.

Verse 19 pictures a perfect friendship, where soul looks understandingly upon soul, each friend seeing himself reflected in the love and trust and comprehension of the other.

Remember the two sides to all this friendship philosophy. It is important not only to get the right kind of friends but to be the right kind of a friend to others. Are we the sort who are filling the lives of others with good cheer, helping them upward and ahead on life's path?

Questions and Answers

Annois Reader. How do you reconcile the statement, "if any man will do His will he shall know the doctrine," with the widely differing views of equally well-meaning Christians?

In this passage, John 7: 17, Jesus is speaking simply of the question of the divine source of His teaching. He was constantly repeating the reason made in the preceding verse: "My doctrine is not mine, but his that sent me." The Jews thought he spoke with his own human authority; he asserted that his authority came from God. And he told them that the reason they could not perceive this was the sinful hardness of their hearts. "If you were really willing to do God's will," he told them, "you could know that my teaching comes from Him." It is this fact that makes faith in Christ a fair spiritual test; those who reject Him are not really willing to obey God; those who really are on the lookout for God's guidance and who will actually submit their wills to Him will know the truth about Jesus. While not much in this particular verse, your question notes another problem, which is why "equally well-meaning Christians" differ so widely on religious matters, when the promises of divine guidance are so numerous and so emphatic. One would reasonably think, if God promises to guide every one who will follow Him to do so, that all who do yield themselves to Him would see everything alike. Briefly we may say that most of the things Christians differ about are not essential. God does promise to guide in vital matters, but not in nonessentials. Read Paul's statements about the unity of Christian believers ought to manifest to you one another concerning matters about which they differ. Then, too, many people who they disagree concerning things about which they really do agree. They all see limited things, one great truth, like the two knights coming up to an inn from different directions, all into a dispute as to whether the right thing before it was of silver or gold. They began to fight, and in the struggle reversed their positions, whereupon each saw that the other had been right, the shield being gold on one side and silver on the other. Not only our point of view but our mental capabilities differ widely; some can understand a specific truth fact, others cannot. We must be tolerant and charitable, believing that God is less and leading those who differ from us. These are those who agree with us. But there remain great vital principles, like that which is in the passage you quote, upon which Christians can and do agree.

W. T. Millsboro, Del. The reference to things in Heb. 7 is only incidental. The purpose of the argument is to show the superiority of Christ over the Levitical priesthood. The argument is that Melchizedek must have been greater than Abraham because Abraham paid tithes to him; he was therefore greater than all of Levi's descendants because they were descendants of Abraham; since Abraham was the ancestor they were themselves paying tithes to Melchizedek when Abraham did. Christ as a priest ranks with Melchizedek. He is, according to the Scripture, a priest forever after the order of Melchizedek, and because he is the equal of Melchizedek he is greater than all the Levitical priesthood, and so in the person of Abraham paid tithes to Melchizedek centuries before.

Subscriber, Beaver Crossing, Neb. Yes, we believe it does care. And we believe further that if you seek his counsel, it will not be deceived. But there is another view of the matter. Have you been making an idol of your riches? Are you letting the things of the world get out from your view, more and more, as time goes by? There are many to whom riches and success become a snare, making the mercenary and hard. You remember that Jesus said of the deceitfulness of riches (Mark 10: 23). It may be that your troubles and disappointments will yet prove to be a cunning disguise. If you trust in God, putting all your burdens on Him and praying and believing that He will bring it out right, you will have done your share and He will surely do the rest. All things are in His hand and all things work together for good to those who love and serve Him.

M. G. J., Bells, Tenn. Ham, the youngest son of Noah, had four sons, Cush, Mizraim, Phut and Canaan (Gen. 10: 6). The name, race or nationality of his wife is nowhere given. From Ham were descended the Ethiopians and probably the dark-skinned nations of Africa, as well as the Canaanites of Palestine and Phoenicia and even the Egyptians themselves. Like his brothers, Ham was married at the time of the deluge, and was saved in the ark, together with his wife, from the general destruction. Egypt is recognized as "the land of Ham" (see Ps. 78: 51 and other passages). Thus among Ham's descendants there was a wide variety of races and different grades of complexion, from the primitive Chaldeans to the negroes of the equator. The Bible narrative shows that Noah's denunciation was directed not against Ham, but against his fourth son, Canaan, and some have held that the curse (Gen. 9: 25) was accomplished by the subjugation and extermination of the Canaanites by the Jews during the Palestinian conquest.

H. A. H., Larwill, Ind. 1. The restoration of the Jews is referred to in Isa. 2: 2-4; Jer. 3: 18; 16: 14, 15; Romans 11: 25; Ezek. 36: 24; 37: 21-25; 39: 28, etc. The Jewish race is looking forward to developments in the war, in the hope that they may prove favorable to the plan for the creation of a Jewish state in Palestine. Since the beginning of the war, the subject has come prominently to the front and the Zionist movement has taken on new life and activity. Plans are still indefinite, but these will doubtless be discussed fully in the proposed Jewish congress which will probably meet in Washington a few months hence.

M. L., Xenia, Ohio. The name "war babies," which you occasionally read in the stock quotations, is sarcastically applied to munition stocks, which advance by leaps and bounds as the huge orders come in from the warring governments of Europe. These "war babies"—an unworthy brood—are coining millions of profit for the stockholders. A topical poet of the time writes of them that they

"Keep the guns roaring,
And the blood pouring;
The women sighing,
And the soldiers dying."

Existing Buffalo Herds. A correspondent at Manhattan, Mont., writes that she has personally seen a small herd of buffalo now existing in Montana near Ravalli, and another on the Flathead Indian Reservation in Montana, which latter at one time numbered about 900 head; most of them were sold to the Canadian Government.

Reader, Sunnyside, Wash. 1. What you need is a new infusion of faith in God, which comes in answer to earnest prayer. Get closer, if possible, to God's people in your own church, and get in personal touch with their work among the poor, the sick, the unconverted. Hold fast to your faith and never think of letting go. Remember that though you may slip and fall, He will not permit you to be utterly cast down, for so He has promised. Don't be an inactive Christian any longer; get busy and do something for somebody. Ask God to give you something to do for his dear Son's sake, and do it with joy and energy, no matter how humble it may be. That is the best remedy we know of for those who are continually questioning their own heart. When you are in active service, you'll forget about your own troubles and will find to your surprise that sharing your blessings with others has brought you inward joy and renewed confidence. 2. The passage "other sheep which are not of this fold" (John 10: 16) is interpreted as referring to the perishing Gentiles who in due time would be brought in and united with the flock. 3. The language in Matt. 23: 9 was a warning against the craving for ecclesiastical honors and titles and degrees and similar distinctions which has been the bane of the church in all the ages. "The word rabbi tickled the ears and fed the spiritual pride of those ecclesiastics," writes a commentator, and Jesus made it the subject of this special rebuke.

M. K., Bellfield, N. D. God's power is not shortened and there are thousands who can testify to the fact that he is still the same as when David prayed to him: "Who forgiveth all thine iniquities, who healeth all thy diseases." There are many who honestly doubt this; yet there is indisputable evidence of the fact, if we only seek for it conscientiously.

Y. C., Howell, Mo. The chronological figures which you read in the marginal notes of many Bibles are not an integral part of the Scripture by any means. They were the result of the computations of Archbishop Ussher, an Irish church prelate and distinguished scholar, who lived 1580-1656. They have been both a help and a vexation to Bible students. Taking the birth of Christ (A.D. 1) as a starting-point, Ussher reckoned backward as far as authenticated history permitted. He had no other purpose than to assist scholars in getting a right perspective of historical events prior to that date. Many of his calculations have been upset by the later light thrown on ancient history through archeological discoveries, the translation of ancient inscriptions, etc. As to fixing the date of Creation, the first verse of the opening chapter of Genesis still remains unchallenged as the only reference the Bible affords on the subject, viz.: "In the beginning."

The Mosaic books nowhere claim that the world was created in 4,000 B.C. In the New Testament John's Gospel opens with the identical phraseology of the Old Testament, showing that in both dispensations the fact is recognized that the date of world creation is beyond human computation.

E. P., Kearney, Neb. We must forgive others with whom we may be at enmity, if we ourselves desire forgiveness from God. This is an essential condition, and it is emphasized many times in the teachings of Jesus. "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive them that trespass against us," he taught us in the Lord's Prayer. "And as ye stand praying, forgive," he said on another occasion. We must forgive freely and gladly if we would find acceptance, for the unforgiving heart God will not hear. And not only is it our duty to forgive, but, if possible, we should let it be known to the one we have forgiven. Again, we may have a besetting sin. It must be repented of and thrust from us; otherwise, if we cling to it, it will stand as a barrier between us and God. He wants no divided allegiance. If we are weak, we must ask of Him strength to do our duty: to put away the sin, to forgive our enemies.

Reader, Fayette, Idaho. 1. Christians need not expect to escape unjust criticism at times. There are good well-meaning people who take the narrow view, and would compel all Christians to be of one type—their type, of course—and to believe precisely what they believe and worship in all respects as they themselves worship. This is altogether wrong. You may remember what Jesus said to some of these fault-finding folk who desired him to rebuke an independent worker. (See Mark 9: 40.) Our heavenly Father looks at the hearts of men and regards their inmost thoughts and desires as of far greater consequence than outward forms and ceremonies. Moses had trouble in his time with the formalists, and see how he answered them (see Num. 11: 26); and Paul, in the midst of his great apostolic missionary work, had occasion to rebuke some of his followers whose overzeal led them to criticize a few good people who did not choose to copy their methods, but struck out a path for themselves (see Phil. 1: 15-18). If you go on energetically doing your best in a humble way, and asking divine guidance daily, you can afford to overlook the critics. Keep in constant touch with your church; and get on friendly terms with your fellow members. Try hard to put aside all feeling against individuals, no matter what their attitude has been in the past. We think you might cultivate the social side of church membership to advantage. One who holds aloof certainly misses much in the way of Christian fellowship and sociability. 2. The word "castaway" in I Cor. 9: 27 is liable to be misinterpreted. Paul was describing the race in the arena, the struggle for the prize and the risk of losing it. The meaning clearly is that what he dreaded was not total failure of acceptance, but rejection in the great struggle for the special reward of those who "turn many to righteousness" (Dan. 12: 3). See in verses 18-23 his reference to the reward for which he was striving.

Miscellaneous

A. P., Greentop, Mo. Whatever makes for Christian good-fellowship and genuine neighborly feeling among the church membership should be encouraged. We cannot see any reason to object to the specific case mentioned in your letter.

Mrs. B., Blanchard, N. D. While there are in the United States representatives of the Semitic, Hamitic, Mongolian and other races, the original white settlers were Caucasian and the greater part of our present population is of that stock.

Mrs. D. H. M., Delmar. 1. Your friend has evidently been enticed into a dangerous path. We would advise you to get your pastor to talk with him and to tell him of the danger of reading infidel books. 2. Your other question is controversial and one that could not be settled by discussion in the Mail-Bag.

M. G., Crediton, Ont., Canada. The questions you raise are controversial, and doubtless will continue to be so until God in his own good time sees fit to make plain what is now mysterious and obscure. To discuss post-millennial and pre-millennial controversies in the Mail-Bag would not settle anything. The true Christian attitude is to be prayerful and watchful, and to do our whole duty, so that when the summons comes, we may be found faithfully working at our post.

E. J. H., Camden, Me. The various denominational missionary boards have each a standard of qualifications for their candidates for positions in the foreign field. We would suggest that you write to the secretary of your own church missionary board for all information. If you prefer an interdenominational board, write to Rev. A. B. Simpson, or the secretary, Christian and Missionary Alliance, 690 Eighth Avenue, New York City, for the information required.

J. R. K., Lancaster, Pa. Yes, there is forgiveness even for one who has sinned in the way you describe. Jesus saves "to the uttermost," and he has assured us that whoever comes to him will not be rejected. Let the sinner forsake his sins and confess them before God and ask forgiveness for his dear Son's sake. Further, let him not forget to take any opportunity that may arise to make restitution, even if he should have to suffer hardship and privation in doing it. Such a course would prove the sincerity of his repentance. Remember that the dying thief on the cross sought and obtained forgiveness in the last moments of his life.

A Newark, N. J., subscriber adds the New Testament lines in the rhymed books of the Bible. The Old Testament lines appeared recently.

Saints Matthew, Mark and Luke and John Record the life of God's dear Son;
And in the book of Acts we search
The story of the early church.
In Romans righteousness is recited;
Then Corinthians First and Second.
Galatians and Ephesians then Unfold the work of Christ for men.
Philippians and Colossians next.
Thessalonians—for saints perplexed.
Both Timothy and Titus too
The clergy's work bring into view.
Philemon and Hebrews: here's the end Of letters that St. Paul did send.
James, Peter with Epistles two,
Show plainly what good men must do.
And then in order next come on The three Epistles of St. John.
St. Jude the end of evil shows;
With Revelation comes the close
Not only of the present age,
But of the Bible's sacred page.

A HELPING HAND ACROSS THE OCEAN

OUR RELIEF COMMITTEES IN WAR-TORN EUROPE GRATEFUL TO THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

THOSE readers of this journal who responded to its first appeal for help to be sent to the widows and orphans of the war in Europe, when they placed their hands to the plow, knew how far the furrow would lead. That work, so humbly and prayerfully begun, has now spread its over the face of the continent and beyond, into the Near East. It has multiplied amazingly and has already been blessed as a means of assistance to hundreds of thousands of sufferers. Beginning with the organization of a Christian Herald Relief Committee in Rotterdam for aiding Belgian refugees, the work has now extended to ten different countries, including Belgium, Holland, Austria, Germany, France, England, Galicia, Poland, Palestine and Serbia. Arrangements are now under way with a view to opening work in Constantinople. Our first remittance to the Christian Herald Relief Committee at Nish, in Serbia, was made through the State Department on August 17, and is acknowledged in the following letter:

"Department of State,
Washington, August 17, 1915.
Christian Herald, New York City.

Sir: I am directed by the secretary of state to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of August 16, enclosing a check for $100, the equivalent of which I request be transmitted to the American consul at Nish, Serbia, for the Christian Herald Committee for relief purposes, and in reply to advise you that the consul has been instructed to draw on the secretary of state for this amount and pay the proceeds of his disbursement to the committee. The consul was also informed that a letter from the Christian Herald follows. All for cable charges will be sent you at a later date.

Very truly,
am, sir, your obedient servant,

Wm. McNEIL.

"Chief, Bureau of Accounts."

The Serbia Relief Committee includes the following:

Mr. Ralph and Lady Paget, the Excellencies Mr. and Mrs. Voislav Marincovitch, Professor Marko Lecco, Miss Mrs. Van S. Mitchell, Dr. Edward Clark, Dr. Richard Patrong, Colonel Toubert, Mr. Sybil Eden and Miss Mrs. Gruitch. In a letter from Miss Lozanitch (daughter of a former member of the Serbian Cabinet), just received, the writer says:

"WISH you could see what good has been done by sending this sum to Serbia. I am at a moment when the orphans are in desperate need. We have today five thousand children without parents who live all by themselves in fields and woods, and nobody to look after them. And what are the poor innocent creatures to do when cold and sick? Their destiny is decided if they are not helped. You know that you have saved so many lives by getting interested in my people and by having helped them in that splendid way? I was so glad to hear the list of the names who are on the committee, because most of them I know very well personally. I think a better and stronger committee we could not have in Serbia, and all are known as splendid workers. Sir Ralph Paget was for three and a very active member of our Red Cross Society. It is not necessary for me to speak about Dr. R. P. Strong, who is so well known in your country. Colonel Toubert is an Englishman who distinguished himself in the Boer War. Miss Mirka Gruitch is the daughter of a Serbian diplomat who has been for years our minister in Paris and London."

The Serbian Committee was organized with the friendly assistance of Hon. James Young, American consul-general at Nish, who has given valuable aid and advice to the Christian Herald Relief work.

POLAND has been one of the greatest sufferers by the war, and it required many efforts before a Christian Herald Committee could be organized in that unfortunate country. This was done at last through the kind cooperation of high German officials and other friends in Berlin, who entered heartily into the project as soon as a way was opened for relief work. This was finally effected in May last, and on the 28th of that month the first remittance of $20,000 was forwarded by the Fund, to be used at two centers of distribution. A letter from the president of the Dresdner Bank of Berlin, Herbert M. Gutmann, written on July 14, but delayed in transmission and not received until August 16, says:

"It is with great pleasure that I received your letter—original, duplicate and triplicate—of May 28, containing the news of your gift of $20,000. You may be assured that the distribution of this fund will be made in accordance with your wishes; that is to say, the money will be spent for the aid of the widows and orphans (non-combatant sufferers of the war) in Poland. I also note that the fund has been raised by you for help without respect to race or creed, a fact which we appreciate very much. As soon as we receive the reports from the committees in Poland, showing the payments made to widows and orphans, I will send you copies, so that you can see how the money has been spent." The writer adds that the other two presidents of his committee, Prince Hatzfeldt and Dr. Lewald of the Ministry of the Interior, desire to thank the Christian Herald and its readers for the good they have done to the suffering poor of Russian Poland.

IN Holland, where the Christian Herald War Relief campaign was first begun among the homeless and destitute refugees from Belgium, an amazing work has been done. The committee in Rotterdam, under date of August 6, sends the following letter:

"Editors of The Christian Herald, New York.

"DEAR SIRS: As we consider it our duty to fully account to you for the money which you have sent us for distribution among the needy widows and orphans of the war in Holland, we have the honor to enclose herewith years British minister to the Serbian court (from 1910 to 1913). After that he was transferred to the foreign office in London; but he is now in Serbia, working day and night on relief in my country. Lady Paget, who is the daughter of Sir Arthur Paget, has done a great deal for Serbia. She was working as a nurse in a Belgrade hospital during the Balkan-Turkish war. Then she was taken very seriously ill, but when she recovered she again devoted all her time to the wounded. Her mother is an American. Mr. Marincovitch is my brother-in-law. He is minister for commerce and agriculture. Professor Lecco is a professor of chemistry at the University of Belgrade a list of the gifts that we have made on your behalf.

"The net proceeds in Dutch currency of the two remittances received from you, viz: $10,000 and $2,500, are respectively 24,621.17 florins and 6,274 florins. In addition to this, there is bank interest amounting to 58.63 florins, making a total income of 30,953.80 florins. This sum has been distributed in the manner set forth in the enclosed list, which requires no comment, except the last item of 2,569.05 florins, which sum, although still in hand, has already been allotted to various widows and orphans, and will shortly be paid out. Our office and administration expenses have been supplied by members of your Dutch Committee, and there are no bank charges, the Rotterdamsche Bankvereniging of this place having kindly agreed to keep the account current without charging. We shall later on account to you for the above mentioned 2,569.05 florins, and meanwhile all of us remain at your disposal to be part of your 'Helping Hand across the Ocean.'"

"We shall be glad if, after examination of the enclosed, you will let us have formal discharge to the extent of the amounts accounted for. Enclosed herewith you will also find, together with their translations, a few letters of thanks picked out at random from the numerous letters that have come in."

Yours very truly,
THE CHRISTIAN HERALD DUTCH COMMITTEE FOR RELIEF TO WIDOWS AND ORPHANS OF THE WAR.

P. C. JONGENEEL,
Secretary.

ACCOMPANYING this letter is a long list of the beneficiaries of the Fund which is very instructive. It covers twelve foolscap sheets, and shows how carefully and wisely the money has been distributed among the widows and orphans who, having been deprived of their natural providers by the war, are now being cared for in Holland. Some of the widows have as many as three, four and five children. There are many little groups of orphans who have lost both parents. In every case the beneficiaries were absolutely without means. Besides the main work of the Rotterdam Committee, it was enabled through the Fund to give much needed help to the Home for Belgian Children at Amsterdam, and the Belgian Orphans' Home at Leiden; also to urgent and special cases recommended by the Committee at The Hague, the Committee at Utrecht, the Dutch Relief Commission of Rotterdam, the special fund of Princess De Ligne and the Sewing Department of the American Relief Commission at Rotterdam. Our Fund was also the means of helping cases specially recommended by the Belgian Committee at Maastricht, the Dutch Committee for Belgian Refugees at Veenhuizen, etc. At the time of sending the report, there was still unappropriated a sum of 2,569.05 florins. The full report of our Rotterdam Committee will be published by the Christian Herald in a pamphlet at an early date.

Accompanying the Rotterdam report are several letters, samples of many others of a similar character, received from beneficiaries of the Fund, showing how deeply grateful they are for the helping hand America has extended to them in their time of direst need.

"I thank you from the bottom of my heart," writes J. D., of Scheveningen, "for the generous gift you have sent me and which I received through the committee. Although it is impossible for me to ease my mental suffering, you have shown that it is a sweet thing for a mother to be able to provide the necessities of life for her child."

C. H. D., of Grubbenvorst, writes: "I can hardly tell you what heavy troubles it has helped me out of, now that the serious moment is near, to be able to think that I will not have to go into deepest need for the first time. Allow me in a few words to tender my sincere thanks."

Mme. O. writes as follows from Hattem:

"I do not know how to express my thankfulness and gratitude for the sum of 1.10 florins which send me weekly through the intermediary of the committee. I feel my heartfelt thanks for your extraordinary goodness and generosity. The condition in which I am at present is very sad—in addition to this, my son is at the front with my six nephews; that is sad enough. If I were young it would not matter, as I could then earn back something of what I have lost; but now at my age this is difficult. Once more I tender my thanks."

It may be remarked here that 1.10 florins is the equivalent of 44 cents American money!

In view of the many pressing demands that are flowing in upon the Rotterdam Committee, another remittance of $500 has been forwarded to Treasurer Jongeneel, to be applied at the discretion of the committee.

Jongeneel, to be applied at the discretion of the committee.

WE SHARE with our readers, and especially with those who have aided the relief work by their generous gifts, the satisfaction of knowing that up to the present time the work has more than fulfilled our expectations. All of the committee are composed of earnest men and women, of high standing in their communities, and every dollar is being expended to the best advantage in averting want and relieving suffering. All contributions in aid of this great work of humanity should be addressed, The Christian Herald Widows and Orphans Relief Fund, Bible House, New York, N. Y. Every gift will be duly acknowledged.

THE SUMERIAN EPIC OF PARADISE

WHAT THE LATELY DECIPHERED TABLET TELLS OF THE CREATION, THE FALL AND THE FLOOD

By PROFESSOR EDGAR J. BANKS

IN THE Persian Gulf, about twenty miles from the Arabian coast, is a group of islands, the largest of which is called Bahrein. This island, which is twenty miles in length and ten in width, is low and sandy in most places, but here and there an oasis rich in date palms dots the island with spots of green. "The Mountain of the Mist" in the center rises to the height of four hundred feet. The eight thousand people who live in Manameh, its largest town, are mostly Arabs of the fanatical Wahabi sect. Fish and seaweed are their chief food, and the only fresh water they have to drink is brought from springs at the bottom of the sea. The natives, with goat-skin bags, dive to the bottom, and holding the openings down upon the bubbling spring, swim to the surface with their bags filled with sweet water. The extensive pearl fisheries for which the islands have always been famous is their one great industry. The Dutch Reformed Church has long maintained a mission station upon the island, and that has been possible because Bahrein is under British protection.

The history of Bahrein is long and interesting. Ancient tombs found in the interior tell us that even the Phoenicians once settled there. The kings of Assyria frequently fought there. The Babylonians called the island Dilmun.

Again the island is the center of interest, for there has recently been discovered in Babylonia a large clay tablet recording the story of Paradise, the Deluge, and the Fall of Man; and the story tells us that the island of Bahrein, the ancient Dilmun, was the paradise, the Garden of Eden, where man first lived.

The newly deciphered tablet recording this story was among the many inscribed objects found in the ruins of Nippur by the expedition sent to Babylonia from the University of Pennsylvania. It is estimated that about seventy thousand inscribed objects were discovered at Nippur, so many that for nearly twenty years they have been stored in the Museum of the University of Pennsylvania, waiting for scholars to read them. Professor Stephen Langdon, a young American scholar, who is professor of Assyriology in Jesus College, Oxford, England, a chair endowed by an American family, was visiting the museum in Philadelphia in the autumn of 1912. At that time he copied a number of the tablets, one of which was a triangular fragment. It appears in the upper right corner of the obverse, and the lower left corner of the reverse of the accompanying photographs. He took the small fragment of the clay tablet to Oxford, where it was shown to the eminent English scholar, Professor Sayce, and it was discovered that it recorded a part of an early Sumerian story of the flood and of the fall of man.

At once an intense interest was awakened. The discovery was reported by the present writer in the columns of the Christian Herald of July 22, 1914. Though but a small fragment of the tablet had been found, it was large enough to give an idea of the importance of the story. Search for the missing fragments was then made among the thousands of unread tablets in the museum. The two missing fragments were discovered and carefully fitted together, and the valuable tablet was nearly complete. It is only here and there that small portions of the broken away, and from the context we may be pretty sure of what was written in the missing lines.

THE tablet is of baked clay, of a light brownish color. It measures seven and a half inches in length and five in width. The obverse side is flat; the reverse is slightly convex. Upon each side are columns of fine cuneiform writing, six in all, covering the entire tablet. It contains about two hundred and twenty-three lines of writing still visible, but originally it contained three hundred lines. It bears no date, but many of the clay documents found in the Babylonian ruins. Its approximate age may be determined by the style of the writing, by the shape of the tablet, by the place where it was found and perhaps by the dated objects found with it, and which apparently date from the same time. Scholars are agreed that this tablet comes from about a thousand years before the Biblical story of the flood was written. A complete translation of the story has just been issued by the press of the University of Pennsylvania.

The story is written not in the Semitic, Babylonian, but in the Sumerian language. The Sumerians were the first civilized people who lived in the lower Mesopotamian valley, just to the north of the Persian Gulf. To just what race they belonged, or where they originally lived no man knows. We are only sure that a very early time, possibly about 4500 B.C., they came to Babylonia, bringing a high civilization with them. They wrote the language in cuneiform characters upon tablets of clay and stone. They had a highly developed religion, literature and art. Long poems and legends and historic inscriptions have come from them. We have the statues of their kings, the jewels worn by their women, the business documents of their people, and even toys of their children. They were the cultured people of the world of six thousand years ago, just as were the Greeks of a later period. After the Sumerians had occupied Mesopotamia for several centuries, the Semite Babylonians, the people of whom Abraham was descended from whom the Jews descended, appeared for their unknown home and entered the valley. They conquered the old civilized Sumerians, possessed their cities, and adopted their culture. The Semites had their own written language, but soon they began to write the spoken language in the Sumerian characters. They adopted many of the Sumerian religious customs, and made that earlier civilization their own. It was the cultured Sumerians who wrote the story upon the tablet now treasured in Philadelphia.

A brief outline of the story, as Professor Langdon understands it, is as follows: Enki, the god of the sea, and his wife or daughter Ninella, ruled over mankind in paradise. Paradise was the land of Dilmun, or the modern island of Bahrain. In paradise sickness was unknown. Sin had not entered. Though the years passed, no man grew old, for it was a land of perpetual youth. No wild beasts destroyed the flocks of the shepherd, and no storms raged over the place. In paradise all was peace and happiness. For some reason which the story does not state, Enki, the god, decided to destroy mankind with a flood, and he revealed his purpose to Nintud, the goddess who had created mankind. For nine months and nine days the flood raged, and men, so the story says, were drowned in the water "like tallow and fat." But Nintud, the mother-goddess, determined to save the god Tagtug, and him she called to the shore and embarked on a boat. King Tagtug, who was thus saved, corresponds to the Biblical Noah. Professor Langdon even identifies his name with that of Noah. After the flood Tagtug was made a god, and it was the custom of the Babylonians to deify their kings after death. After the flood the goddess Nintud explained to the god Enki how Tagtug had escaped the universal destruction, and had become a god. He was then permitted to live, and he became a gardener. Enki, taking him into his temple, revealed to him the secrets of the trees and plants. It seems that Tagtug was permitted to eat of the fruit of all the trees, excepting that of the cassia, a tree which is still common in the Orient, and which resembles the cinnamon. But Tagtug was disobedient. He ate of the fruit of the cassia tree, and at once the goddess Nintud took from him immortality. He became subject to old age and weakness and death. Thus was he driven from paradise not the paradise of a garden, but from the state of immortality. He was compelled to labor and suffer until the gods took pity on him and taught him various arts to comfort him.

Such is the interpretation which Professor Langdon gives to the poem. To follow a literal translation to the end of this long broken inscription would be useless to most readers, nor would its meaning be always apparent; yet this story would be incomplete without it. The following translation, omitting many of the repetitions, and somewhat more free than the literal translations for the scientists, will suffice.

TABLET OF THE CREATION, FLOOD AND FALL OF MAN

Ye are they who dwell
In the mountain of Dilmun, a holy place. . . .
The mountain of Dilmun is a holy place; the mountain of Dilmun is pure.
The mountain of Dilmun is pure, the mountain of Dilmun is clean.
Alone in Dilmun they dwell.
Where Enki dwelt with his consort
That place is pure, that place is clean.
Alone in Dilmun they dwell.
Where Enki dwelt with the pure divine queen. . . .
In Dilmun the raven shrieked not.
The kite shrieked not.
The lion slew not.
The wolf killed not the lambs.
The dog approached not the resting kids.
The birds of heaven forsook not their young.
The doves were not put to flight.
None said, "Thou art the demon of the evil eye."
None said, "Thou art the demon of the headache."
None said to the old woman, "Thou art an old woman."
None said to the old man, "Thou art an old man."
None said, "A man has diverted a water course."
A prince withheld not his wisdom.
None said, "A deceiver deceives."
Ninella spoke to Enki, her father:
"A city thou hast founded, a city thou hast founded, and a fate thou hast given;
In Dilmun a city thou hast founded. . . ."

FOLLOWING this description of Dilmun, where the gods dwelt, where mankind possessed immortality, where the birds of prey were harmless and the wolves and the lambs dwelt together in peace, there is a break of several lines. From what follows it seems that the missing lines told how mankind had angered the gods, and Enki decided to destroy Dilmun with a flood. The poem then continues:

"Thy city shall drink water in abundance.
Dilmun shall drink water in abundance.
Pools of bitter water, instead of sweet water, shall flow.
. . . the waters shall rise.
His city shall drink water in abundance.
Dilmun shall drink water in abundance. . . .
Now, O sun-god, shine forth."
Verily it was so.
He who renders decision, who possesses wisdom,
To Nintud, the mother of the land of Sumer, revealed his counsel in the temple.
He spoke: "To me no man may enter. . . .
Cause him to perish for me; cause him to perish for me," was his command. . . .
"The fields shall receive the waters of Enki
It shall be the first day of the first month.
It shall be the ninth day of the ninth month, the month when the waters shall cease.
Like fat, like fat, like tallow [mankind shall become,] Nintud, the mother of the land,
Had created them.
Nintud, by the bank of the river, spoke:
"Enki, their fate is fixed, it is fixed."
Her herald summoned the divine anointed ones.
She was not wroth against the pious sons of men.
Nintud was not wroth against the pious.
Her herald caused the divine anointed ones to return.
Nintud was not wroth against the pious.
"My king, who was filled with fear, . . .
Alone set his foot upon the boat.
Two as watchmen he placed on guard."
Enki devastated the fields.
The fields received the waters of Enki.
It was the first day of the first month. . . .
It was the ninth day of the ninth month, the month when the waters ceased.
Like fat, like fat, like tallow [mankind became]

After considerable repetition of the story of the coming of the waters there seems to be an account, partly broken away, of how the god Enki became reconciled with King Tagtug, who had survived the deluge, received him into his temple, and placed him in a garden, Eabaragultu, where he became a gardener. The poem continues:

The divine Tagtug, with glad heart, opened the door of the temple.
Enki revealed secrets unto the divine Tagtug.
In Eabaragan he gave unto him.
The divine Tagtug was confided. He raised the left hand; the right hand he composed.

There follows a list of plants which grew in the garden, and the goddess commanded Tagtug the fruit of which plants he might eat.

"My king, as to the woody plants," she commanded:
"He shall cut off; he shall eat."
"My king, as to the fruit-bearing plants," she commanded:
"He shall pluck; he shall eat. . . ."
"My king, as to the prickly plants," she commanded:
"He shall pluck; he shall eat. . . ."

"My king approached the cassia plant.
He plucked; he ate."
Of the plant she determined its fate.
In the name of Enki, Nintud uttered a curse.
"No release from sorrow shall he know even till his death."

Thus the hero of the story was made to suffer. Several of the following lines are broken away, but in the final lines of the tablet we have a picture of the evil fate which befell Tagtug:

"My brother, what of thee is ill?"
"My pastures are distressed. . . ."
"My brother, what of thee is ill?"
"My flocks are distressed. . . ."
"My brother, what of thee is ill?"
"My mouth is distressed. . . ."
"The queen who fills the mouth I have created for thee. . . ."
"My brother, what of thee is ill?"
"My health is ill."
"The queen of life I have created for thee."
"My brother, what of thee is ill?"
"My understanding is distressed."
"The lord who renders the understanding good I have created for thee."

THE question which every reader may be inclined to ask is: What connection has the old Sumerian poem of the fall of man with the Biblical story of the expulsion of Adam and Eve from the Garden of Eden? Recent excavations in the buried Babylonian cities have revealed several tablets recording stories of the creation of the world and of the flood. Some of them are similar to the Biblical accounts. Others are so different that it is difficult to believe that there is any connection between them. This newly discovered story of the fall of man bears little resemblance to the Biblical story. The order of events is very different. The Biblical account first tells of a garden, of the expulsion of man from the garden, and finally of a flood to destroy man after he had become corrupt. The Sumerian story first tells of a flood, then of a garden in which the survivor lived, and finally of his expulsion. Professor Langdon fails to see or to use the future tense in the decision of Enki that a flood is to destroy mankind, and thus to me it seems that the poem is made rather obscure. To identify the name Tagtug with Noah, as Professor Langdon seeks to do, is a comparatively easy matter, for the same Sumerian signs are pronounced in many different ways, and they might as well be identified with scores of other names. However, there is undoubtedly a connection between the two stories, as the present writer pointed out in a previous number of the Christian Herald.

The Sumerian story is merely one of the many forms in which the old stories were told. The discovery of the tablet is another bit of evidence that, way back in some very remote age, there was a far older tablet which actually recorded the stories of the early chapters of Genesis. The man who wrote this poem was more or less familiar with that earlier account, but the poem he wrote bore little resemblance to the original. Not yet has that early tablet been recovered, but who can say that some future explorer among the oldest ruins of Babylonia may not discover it, and find recorded upon it the pure original account similar to the opening Bible chapters? Dr. Langdon's tablet and the other stories of the creation and the flood are its remote descendants. The discoveries are teaching that such a tablet once existed, and some time it may appear.

GOSPEL NEWS FROM HERE AND THERE

Missionary J. M. L. Harrow of Cape Palmas, Liberia, West Africa, writes that the work is going slowly at present. The rice crop last year was actually a failure, and everywhere the people are suffering a hitherto unknown experience. That section, Mr. Harrow states, and he has lived there twenty years. The work of this missionary is conducted among five tribes, and everywhere the same condition prevails. Mr. Harrow asks an interest in the prayers of the Christian Herald readers.

Rev. Dr. Daniel Bliss, president of the Syrian Protestant College, has lost his faithful wife and fellow worker. Dr. Bliss, who is now ninety-two years old, was the pioneer of the mission work in Beirut, Syria. His wife, Abby Maria Word

Bliss, was in her eighty-fifth year and in the sixtieth year of service as a missionary. Dr. Bliss has resigned the work there in favor of his son, Dr. Howard Bliss. Besides her husband and Dr. Howard Bliss, she leaves two sons, Dr. Frederick Bliss and William Bliss, and a daughter, Mrs. Gerald Dale.

Mrs. Clarence D. Ussher, an American missionary, died at the mission in Van, Armenia lately as the result of hardships and suffering incidental to the war. Her husband, Rev. Clarence Ussher, is seriously ill. Practically all of the American Board missionaries have abandoned the station at Van and gone to Tiflis. Among the number are Rev. Ernest Yarrow and wife, Miss Gertrude Rogers and Mrs. M. W. Reynolds.

SUPERSTITION AND RELIGION

TEXT: 1 Sam. 1: 3. "Let us fetch the ark, . . . that when it cometh among us, it may save us."

LET us fetch the ark." What was the ark? It was a chest made of wood. It was overlaid with pure gold, within and without, and crowned with a mercy-seat of pure gold. What was its purpose? It was a material thing representing a spiritual idea. It was a thing made with hands to symbolize things not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. It was a temporality pointing to a spirituality. That is how humanity deals with unseen presences; it makes visible vestures for them, garments that can be touched.

Here are ten thousand men, a nation's army, moving with one step, to one music, on one mission. They are possessed by one sentiment, that of patriotism; they are swayed by one idea, that of freedom. But these sentiments and ideas are intangible, spiritual, unseen. The nation must give them visibility; they must become enshrined in vestures that can be handled and seen. So we give our army a flag, and a flag which can be touched represents the unseen which cannot be touched; it represents patriotic sentiment, national enthusiasm, the common hope. Through that flag there gleams the idea of duty and of right. To abuse the flag is to insult the nation.

The ermine which our judges wear is the symbol of an idea. That visible robe represents the unseen vesture of authority with which their fellow men have clothed them. All regalia and every badge which man wears are symbols of ideas, representatives of the unseen. We make a cross to stand as the symbol of sovereignty. We make a flag to stand as the symbol of the idea of nationality. We make a robe to stand as the symbol of the idea of authority. All these are visible representatives of unseen forces and powers. Our very instinct leads us to give these unseen presences a local and visible habitation and name. And here was God, an unseen Power, and men hungered for some material symbol to represent the unseen and eternal. And God said: "Make an ark of wood and gold," and it shall stand as the symbol of the meeting of God and man, the confluence of time and eternity, the blending of the unseen influences of heaven with the unseen aspirations of earth. So they made an ark, and just as the flag is the emblem of national patriotism, so the ark was the emblem of national religion; it represented the unseen relationship between them and their God.

Now, the character of symbols depends upon the character of man. As men become better, symbols become enriched. As men deteriorate symbols become degraded. Is that not so with the commonest of all symbolism which we call language? These words which I am now addressing to you are all symbols which I am using to represent my unseen thought. The corruption of language follows the degradation of man. Language loses significance; it becomes debased, and its deterioration must be traced to its essential cause in the deterioration of men. It is the same with other symbols beside language. They become emptied of their royal significance when men lose their royalty. The more high-minded is the soldier, the more illustrious is his flag; the more debased is the soldier, the more vulgar is the flag. And so symbols wait upon character; they can become gradually impoverished in their meaning, until at length they become as empty as those shells which are strewn in myriads along our shores, empty houses which have lost their tenants; forsaken and lifeless forms.

Cripples Leaning on Reeds

But now, mark you, a strange foible and trick of human nature. When our feelings and enthusiasms have deteriorated, and the symbols have lost their life, we are prone to hug the empty shell, and we delude ourselves into the belief that the empty symbol can do what could be done only by its living guest. Thoroughly bad men wear a crucifix, an empty shell, a cross without a Saviour. One of the most notorious criminals of our time was found with a crucifix next to his skin. A precisely similar resource is illustrated in my text. These Israelites had got into bad ways. Their aspirations had fallen. Vice and iniquity had eaten into their character. And now they were distressed by their foes. What was their resource? Utterly unmindful of their personal wickedness, they said one to another: "Let us fetch the ark, that when it cometh it may save us." They fetched a dead, empty shell, dead and empty because they were dead in trespasses and sins, and they hoped by that lifeless form to defeat their foes. They fought and were beaten! The ark availed them nothing. And there stood up a prophet who told them that arks were nothing without character, and that if they would have the help of God, they must themselves rise into richer life. "If ye do return unto the Lord with all your heart . . . prepare your hearts unto the Lord and serve him only, and he will deliver you."

Now, let us realize their position. They had lost the purity of their character, and they tried to pervert a religious symbolism into unreligious magic. They thought that a dead symbol would do the work of a living devotion, and that is superstition. It would be just as reasonable for a man who was being drawn headlong to ruin by drink, to seek and save himself by putting on a blue ribbon, a symbol of sobriety, and yet to continue to grovel in the waste and slough of passion and lust. For bad men to send for the ark to protect them is evidence that their religion has degraded them into the grossest superstition.

Trusting in a Material Cross

Now, I don't know that superstition of this kind is widely prevalent to-day. But here and there you will find that the spirit still exists. There are homes in which Bibles are kept, not to be read, but because their presence is supposed to surround the home with a certain sanctity and protection. Crucifixes are still worn, not as symbols of spiritual redemption, but as personal charms—subtle spells, to guard from harm. And this leads me to speak of a mental temperament which I am afraid is widely diffused, and which betokens spiritual degeneracy. The Israelites sent for the ark, the symbol of religion, not to aid them in attaining nobler character, but to save them from the Philistines. Now, all religious symbols, all ceremonies, all means of grace, when rightly used, are used for the purpose of bringing our spirits into closer communion with God, that our spirits may shine more and more with the grace and beauty of holiness. But are we not prone to use these symbols and means as the Israelites used their ark, to obtain a sort of magical protection from physical peril, and not deliverance from the captivity of sin? Do we not tend to use them as safeguards against material loss, rather than as helps to escape from sin? Are we not inclined to employ them, not to beautify characters, but to save ourselves from the Philistines? There are great masses of people who look upon crosses and masses in the light of a spell, and have peculiarly small influence upon the moral character of their lives. They consider themselves being under a special protection, and under that protection they gamble and drink, and indulge in manner of riotous living.

Well, we may not wear the crucifix as a charm, may have no ark to use as a mystic spell. But do we use the means of grace called prayer? The primary purpose of all religious symbols and ceremonies is to bring our spirit into communion with the great Spirit of holiness and truth. The grace which is sought by prayer is this: that the spirit may be washed, cleansed, made white and beautiful in holiness; we pray in order that we may be made new to God. My prayer is answered when I rise from my knees a better man. The primary purpose of prayer was to save men from themselves, their lowliness, and fill their consciousness with God. The great purpose of prayer is to save men from themselves and fill their souls with God. But the divine purpose of the ark was forgotten, and it came to be regarded as a magic spell to save them from the Philistines. And is not the divine purpose of prayer so often forgotten, and is it not often employed as a charm to save us from poverty and loss and danger, but not from sin?

Christ in You the Hope of Glory

There is a short paragraph in the life of one of our saintliest men of our time, which I will read to you as it specially illustrates my argument. In one of his letters, written in manhood, he writes: "I do not recollect I was taken up with nine other boys and sent to be punished, and I prayed to escape the punishment. The master, previous to flogging all the other boys, said to me, to the great bewilderment of the whole school: 'Little boy, I excuse you; I have particular regard for you.' That incident settled my mind for life; only I doubt whether it did me any good. My prayer became a charm. I knew I carried about with me a talisman which would save me from all harm. It did not make me better; it simply gave me security. That was what the ark did for the Israelites; that all that prayer does for us—composes our fears but not affecting our morals—giving us a sense of security, but not delivering us from our sins. The exercise has been thus debased, it will be of little use when we need it most; refuge will fail us when we stand at last in the presence of the pure and holy God. Don't let us use prayer as a spell to shield our souls, use it as a means to purify our souls."

Now, just let me refer you for one moment to the symbols which are here on this table before us. These symbols are intended to help us to realize historical facts, that we may apprehend spiritual realities. This bread and wine are to help us remember a dying Lord, that we may be able to hold of the living one, and feel the power of his resurrection in a redeemed and sanctified life. The symbols are to help us to realize the Saviour's sacrifice in the realization we may rise into newness of life. They are like the ark, intended to help us lose ourselves that we may find ourselves in him. Do we always use the sacrament in that way? Are there some here who would be compelled to say: "It does not make me better; it simply gives me security. It is prone to become to any of us a kind of magic spell, a magic feast, giving us a greater sense of security, but with little or no influence upon our moral life. Do we ever regard it as a function which it is risky to ignore, which it is policy to use, which, being used, hedges the life about with the defense of divinity?"

Brethren, the Sacrament is worthless, it is more than worthless, if it does not help us to a holier, more consecrated life. Let us beware lest we regard it as a charm, to secure us in indifference. Let us beware lest we regard the symbols as an ark which will save us, altogether apart from our continual prayer to the King.

I pray that as we commune together, we may be by humble prayer, by sincere desire and holy expectation, that the material symbols help to the presence of the great Master himself! May we feel him to be in our midst as a sanctifying and uplifting Presence, turning indifference into self-hunger; breathing upon us and converting selfishness into ardent piety; illumining our minds by chasing away every paralyzing fear; making us be filled with his own joy, and free with the liberty of the children of God.

WHERE JESUS WALKED

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

SLOWLY the warming sunbeams fall,
Across the quiet way;
The far-off beat of passing feet
Fills all the fading day.
A thrill of war is in the air,
And far away a gun
Speaks shrilly through the evening calm,
And lo! some life is done.

AND yet, where blood and smoke and flames
Curl up to meet the sky,
The Saviour walked long years ago,
Where armies fight and fly.
He told men how to live their lives,
And how, in time, to die.

PERHAPS, beneath some crumbled arch,
He laid his gentle hand
On one whose life was torn with strife,
And said: "I understand!"
Perhaps, where streets are scarred with shot,
And noises born of hell
Shriek from afar, the shattered stones
Of Jesus' love could tell.

WHERE dying men gasp out their lives,
Where rumpled banners sway;
Where blood lies on the dusty road,
Where hate is fierce today—
Perhaps some flower, blooming, shows
Where Jesus knelt to pray.

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR. LED BY J. H. JOWETT, D.D., F. B. MEYER, D.D.,

The Invincible Soul

MONDAY, September 12. I Peter 3:13. "Who is he that will harm you, if ye be followers of that which is good?" Here is the unveiling of a road—"that which is good." It is the highway of the good. It is not always an inviting road. Externally it sometimes seems forbidding. It offers no inlets of ease, or of soft goings for the feet. It is rough, and difficult, and lonely. Now and then it is a very unconventional road, scarcely reckoned among the accepted "ways" of society. Sometimes it is the narrowest of all paths, as a sheep-track over the hills. And yet once it may be ample as a noble turnpike, thronged with goodly company, the ransomed of the Lord, singing in joy and heavenly song.

Here is a description of pilgrims on the road: "They are following the good, which ever the road may turn. If it become a sweet field-stretching through green pastures and by still waters they are grateful for the comforts, but they are careful lest the bliss should become the chain. The path suddenly turn on to a field of battle, the forces of devilry are mobilized and massed for battle, they follow on, confident that he who began to make the road has finished it, and that he is somewhere near the throne. And so they march on, through the terrors of battle, and through the seductive whisperings of siren voices, and through the seductions of Vanity Fair, and through the gloom of the Valley of the Shadow of Death. They follow the gleam! There is the promise of spiritual immunity. 'It shall harm you?' When we follow the good, we lose some of our baggage; we can never lose ours. Our reputation may be assailed, but we can despoil our character. Our ease may be lost, but our peace abides unshaken. Our treasure is in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal. When we follow the good we have God with us all the way." J. H. J.

Only God Satisfies the Heart

TUESDAY, September 13. Isaiah 44:12-20. "He that sitteth on ashes." We are led by the prophet to an idol-factory. A molten image is made from glowing metal, beneath the heavy hand of the smith. "Surely," the prophet says, "any in his voice, 'the product of such work should be strong to help! Yet notice that it is not whom he has made is not able to give life, its maker one pulse of strength, for he is weary and his strength faileth, he is faint and must sink under his work." Next we are taken into a factory, wooden idols, where a carpenter is at work, and a pattern with red ochre on a block of timber, carving the figure of a man; but surely a god is not able to create his own embodiment! Lastly, we follow a private individual to the forest. He cuts a suitable tree, part of which is fashioned into an idol part used for firewood. We can hear the crack of delight as the man warms his hands and gets food by the crackling logs, and immediately he bends in prayer before the remainder!

How many men act thus, with such incredible folly? Do they not realize the incongruity of their actions? Ah! there is a divine hunger in man. The body needs food, so does the mind need truth and the heart love. We were made for God, and only God can really satisfy. Hence, beside the corn, the mango-field, or the breadfruit, but the temple, the shrine, the path to which is made hard by the steps of successive generations. A new life is to be obtained only in fellowship with God. He is the bread of God, through which we feed on the essence of God. If we cannot get this, he will fain "fill his belly with the husks that the swine eat." F. B. M.

The Generosity of Friendship

WEDNESDAY, September 14. I Samuel 18:4. "And Jonathan stripped himself of the robe that was upon him, and gave it to David, and his apparel, and his sword, and to his bow, and to his quiver." In the verse preceding the one quoted above, it is said that the soul of Jonathan was knit with the soul of David, and Jonathan loved him as his own soul. There is no other explanation of the act of the son of Saul, who was in danger of losing his rightful kingdom to David, than that his friendship was of that character that gives up the thing it really wants for the sake of its love.

Jonathan was not different from his father Saul in his regard for imperial power. He died fighting for it on the battlefield of Gilboa. His sentiment for his friend David was no weak thing of a dreamer. He saw that the people were turning toward the harp-player and the popular hero who had slain Goliath. He might have yielded to a jealousy like that of Saul, who in his jealous rage and fear for his kingdom threw his javelin at the sweet singer of the shepherd country. Jonathan was a man of higher type; his loyalty of love was greater than his thought of self.

What is it to be loyal to a friend? It is willingness to give up for that friend something that we ourselves want. We sometimes give our cast-off clothing, or a bauble of which we have become tired, to the poor or to an acquaintance. It is charity, it is often not a semblance of real sacrifice or real love. Great giving always involves the parting with that which is dear to us. The father knows it when he takes voluntarily the hard-earned savings of a lifetime and spends what might make his old age comfortable and free from care on the education of a son or a daughter. It is the divestiture of a thing we want for the sake of another—this is the proof of real affection.

What is the measure of our love? The Italian poet said:

Measure thy love by loss instead of gain,
Not by the wine drunk but the wine poured out;
For love's strength is measured by love's sacrifice,
And he who suffers most hath most to give.

There is no price that a great loyalty will not give for its own. C. S. C.

The Supreme Desire

THURSDAY, September 15. John 12:25-36. "Father, glorify thy name." The question of the Greeks reminded our Lord of all the anguish of the coming days. He knew very well that these earnest enquirers could never be satisfied by contact with his life, however beneficent and useful. The soul of man asks to know how sin may be pardoned, victory won over the dark powers, and the eternal life imparted. None of these were possible save through His death. He must be led as a lamb to the slaughter, all sin must be made to meet on his head, and only by his stripes could the world be healed. But how terrible the cost, not so much in physical pain as in soul-anguish! We can never realize the horror, to a nature like Christ's, of bearing the sins of the world. It was from this that he shrunk, when in human weakness he cried, "Father, save me from this hour."

But to that hour he had been traveling from the long eternity of the past. On account of the Cross, and for the death of Calvary, he had been coming through the ages of human history, starting from the pre-creation stage, as "the Lamb slain from before the foundation of the world." Speaking after the manner of men, it seemed as though he withdrew the first cry, and substituted for it the all-inclusive petition that the Father might be glorified: "Father, glorify thy name." After all, this must ever be our supreme aim. We are so tempted to put our prayers, our wishes, our pet schemes, in the first place. We cry out against suffering, or apparent failure, or opposition. We see fiery trial looming in the distance, and ask to be saved from it at any cost. Let us call back these thoughts, and gather up our soul into the one passionate request: "Father, though it bring me to Calvary, glorify thy name." F. B. M.

The March of Faith

FRIDAY, September 16. Numbers 13:30. "And Caleb stilled the people before Moses, and said, 'Let us go up at once, and possess it; for we are well able to overcome it.'" Caleb has been called one of the first members of a National Geographical Society. He went up, with eleven other heads of the children of Israel, from the wilderness of Paran to spy out the land of Canaan, whither the people of God were bound in their long march across the desert. They returned after forty days, bringing with them the fruits of the land "flowing with milk and honey"—pomegranates and figs and grapes from the valley of Eschol. They also brought back word of the inhabitants of the land, some of whom were "men of great stature." Caleb, the leader, was for going up at once and occupying the Promised Land, but the other members of the exploring party voted against him, frightening the people with the report of the obstacles.

It was a backward step in a march that had been one of faith in the God of Israel, whose promise to his children of this land of Canaan had been plain and without regard to the difficulties. They lacked Caleb's courage; they lacked Caleb's faith.

Every day is a day of choice. Every day is an advance or a retrogression. We never stand still. We are either like Caleb, looking with hopeful morning faces up toward the country of our highest dreams—the country God has promised to us—or we are like the hesitant, fearful members of the early exploring band, scared by the obstacles and forgetting the might and the promise of Him who goes before us.

The Promised Land waits upon our daring to follow the gleam of conscience and the voice of God. It may lead through sacrifice and enemies may be powerful, blocking our path; but the prize is always there before us awaiting our forward action, awaiting our march of faith. Am I advancing toward my land of promise, my conquered disposition, my life of helpfulness to others, my championship of the right, my attitude of love and forgiveness of my enemies? Is my march back to the desert or forward to the gardens of God? C. S. C.

The Temple of the Soul

FRIDAY, September 17. I Thessalonians 5:12-28. "Your whole spirit and soul and body preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus." Here is the tripartite nature of man stated without qualification. The soul is central. It is the seat of our personality. From the soul, the individual "I" is ever going upward through the spirit to the eternal and abiding, or descending through the body to the phenomenal and transient. Emerson said that we reside in a three-storied house. The lowest tier is the body, which communicates with the street; the highest is the spirit, which reaches out toward God; and the middle tier is the habitual residence of the thinking, energizing, unsleeping, unresting self. We are fitted with two sets of apparatus, the one reaching out to God, the other to man. Alas, that we use the latter more than the former! They who are dead in trespasses and sins probably have never used their spiritual affinities at all. They are merely soulless. "I have not written unto you as unto spiritual but as unto carnal (i.e. in the Greek, soulless)" (1 Cor. 3:1).

In the Jewish temple were three distinct component parts. The Holy of Holies within the Veil; the Holy Place, and the outer court. From the Holy Place the high priest passed forward into the presence of the Shechinah glory, or backward to the great congregation that awaited him without. Here we hang the symbolic representation of our tripartite division into spirit, soul, and body. And this was probably in the mind of Jesus when he spoke of "the temple of his body." When he died, the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom, so that they were merged in one compartment. So when we die with Christ, the veil of selfishness parts, and the light of the indwelling Spirit shines through the soul, with its thoughts, reasonings, emotions, desires, and even reaches the body; so that all are preserved blameless and holy for the Lord. F. B. M.

The Invitation of the "Open Door"

SATURDAY, September 18. John 10:9. "I am the Door." Christ's open door means the right to admission to all the rooms in God's eternal building. It means "Come in" to all who are restless, homeless, hungry and perishing. Here you will find rest, refreshment, and salvation. Then you can go out and toil for the truth and come in for comfort.

The Revelator says, "I looked, and behold, a door was opened into heaven." Heaven, entered by some other way than Christ, would be hell. "No man cometh to the Father but by me." "I have set before you an open door and no man can shut it." Only you can shut it against yourself. The doorposts are sprinkled with his blood, a sign of his cleansing power. Faith, hope and love are messengers to help you through the open door. The Bible is the guide-book; the pulpit the pointer, the preacher the crier—"Behold the Lamb of God!" There is no temple in God's city; the Lamb is the temple. There is no sun or moon, for the Lamb is the light thereof. There is no more night, death, sorrow, sighing, hunger, nor sinfulness, for the former things are passed away. The Lamb shall feed them, and lead them unto living fountains of water, through all the eternal pastures of privilege, singing before every new glory. "Lift up, ye gates, and be ye lifted up, ye everlasting doors." E. W. C.

ADVANCING THE WORK OF THE KINGDOM

Policeman Becomes a Soul-Winner

REV. ERNEST W. BAUMANN, an American missionary in Argentina, S. A., sends this interesting account of the career of a native convert and his work for the Gospel:

"About the same time that the well-known Italian missionary Penzotti was converted, a policeman named Blanco began to frequent the Methodist preaching services in Buenos Aires. At first he scoffed at the idea of becoming a Christian; but by the convincing words of Dr. Thompson he was induced to peruse the Scriptures. After months of study, his darkened soul was flooded by God's sunlight. When he began the study of the Scriptures he was practically illiterate; painfully he had to study it out word by word. Being a policeman, he would spend much time leaning against a lamp-post studying by its friendly light. The police in Argentina do not have a beat as in our country; they simply stand at one corner.

"Having taught himself to read, Brother Blanco became anxious to open the same fountain of knowledge to others. He soon had a crowd of children, whom he gathered together in an old market. Here he told them of the love of Jesus for the children. One of our missionaries recognized his superior ability and unusual consecration, and secured a large hall for him, which was fitted up for a schoolroom. For many years as high as 400 children received instruction in this school. Many prominent business men helped finance this worthy enterprise. One of the boys, who was found in the street, was taken into the Blanco home and given a careful Christian training. Today he is secretary of the Argentine Supreme Court and is a prominent member of our Second Church.

"When our Bible colporteurs first came to Ecuador, they were met at the custom house by a Jesuit priest who boasted that as long as Ecuador's famous volcano, Chimborazo, stood there would be no Bible tolerated. Today our colporteurs are sowing the Word of Life far and wide over the whole republic, and the government has requested one of the Methodist missionaries to establish a public school system modeled after that of the United States. The need in Ecuador, Bolivia and Peru is very great; there is but one ordained missionary to every 450,000 inhabitants. If the pro rata in the United States were the same, there would be but 218 ministers of the Gospel instead of 160,000, as is actually the case. In the most enlightened parts of South America there is one ordained missionary of the Gospel to every 235,000 inhabitants. Truly South America is a 'neglected continent.'"

The Grasshopper-Eaters

IN ONE of the late numbers of your excellent paper, I see where you mention the fact that in some parts of the world locusts, or what we call grasshoppers, are still eaten. Let me give you a bit of my own history as Bible colporteur in Mexico.

Several years ago, by invitation of Rev. Victoriano D. Baez, presiding elder of the Oaxaca district of the M. E. Church in Mexico, I visited with him the several churches, or missions, that are embraced in his district in the promotion of the circulation of the Scriptures. At one place, I was offering my books for sale to a man who appeared above the average in intelligence, and he wanted to know if that was the book that told of a man eating locusts, grasshoppers, or "chapulines," as the Mexicans call them. I told him that it was. Then he said he did not want a book that told such lies as that. I tried to reason with him, and told him that history said that in those early times some people did eat locusts, and that probably in some places they were still eaten. He was, however, not convinced, and refused to buy a book that "told such a lie."

Some days afterward, I was farther back in the mountains among people who were mostly Indians. They were very poor and had but little to eat, and one of their principal articles of food was grasshoppers, which at that time abounded, for there was a plague of them. Yes, there they ate them and said they were good! Pastor Baez and the rest of our company ate them. I ate some of them too, more to say I had eaten "locusts" than for any other reason. They did not have a bad taste at all, and the quantity I ate would hardly have kept me from starving or being hungry.

Poor Mexico! She is now passing through the most trying period of her history. Nothing can save her but the Bible and the religion of the Bible. Let the Christian world lend a helping hand at this time.

A Queer Chinese Superstition

MISSIONARY GILBERT MCINTOSH, Shanghai, China, writes: "The other day the local papers in Shanghai referred to the fear of impending trouble arising out of the recrudescence of a peculiar superstition which exists in the minds of a number of Chinese regarding 'five-claw chickens.' I quote from the local account:

"The superstition is one which has been believed for centuries, latterly more especially, if not exclusively, by the people in the lowest ranks of life, although at one time more influential people were disposed to attach considerable importance to it. Like many other superstitions, however, it has felt the effects of education, until now it is believed in only by the mere uneducated classes. The superstition is that

AMERICA FIRST

—BY LOUIS DORN—

LAST night, at a meeting of Germans, I heard
The thundering song of the Rhine, and it stirred
My soul to its depths, so that mightily grew
The love for the land of my fathers anew;
And firmly it held me with powerful reins:
The blood of the Teuton awoke in my veins.

I stepped to the street and I glanced at the stars,
That smile upon peace and that frown upon wars;
My heart was entranced, for they seemed to bring down

For Germany's head the victorious crown.
But, passing along, by a friend I was hailed,
Whose ancestors whilom from Britain had sailed.

He said: "Do you see yonder stars in the sky?
As far as they travel, they shine from on high On British domain; and your Germany must Submit to my England and squirm in the dust.
Britannia rules over the lands far and wide;
She's queen of the oceans, we sing it with pride."

And soon we are hot in the midst of debate,
Repeating the words coined by frenzy and hate.
He calls the good Germans barbarians wild;
I shout: "That is slander by liars compiled!"
"The Teutons are war-mad!" he cries, and I hold That British hypocrisy fights for its gold.

Our eyes were aglow with an unholy light;
With quivering lips we put friendship to flight.
We felt that the ties which the heart bind to heart,
From anger and passion were snapping apart;
When suddenly, softly, a voice clear and sweet
Was heard in a hymn from a home near the street.

We stopped and we listened the song we knew well.
Like waves of the ocean the notes rose and fell.
They sounded a message of glorious times,
Of love for the home, for American climes:
"The Star-spangled Banner," so noble and fair,
Rang out, and it hallowed the evening air.

The spell of the strains like an angel came down
To silence the storm and to banish the frown;
And out went my hand; it was fervently grasped
In friendship the Briton and Teuton were clasped.
We spoke not a word, but we pondered it long,
The message for us from America's song:

"Love, Teuton, thy people, its learning and grace;
Love, Briton, thy splendid and glorious race;
But let not that love tear the neighbors apart;
Shoot not at each other the poisonous dart
Of galling remark; and unitedly stand
For waving Old Glory, the flag of the land!"

"The Stars and the Stripes are protecting a home
For all the good folk under heaven's great dome;
A haven of refuge for all the distressed;
A promise of freedom for people oppressed;
An island of peace, while the world is at strife;
For love is its spirit and justice its life!"

We stood there in silence; the song died away.
The hour was sacred; we could not but pray:
"Grant peace among nations, All-powerful Lord,
And teach thou our brothers to bury the sword!"
From Briton and Teuton two prayers had gone;
They rose up to heaven united as one.

all chickens having "claws" on their wings are poisonous, and that they generally foretell disaster. It is not necessary that all "affected" fowls should be possessed of five claws, but the more there are the more poisonous is the flesh.

"About a month ago the superstition obtained to a large extent in Shanghai, where a number of fowls were discovered with 'claws.' The result was that people refused to buy them, and for a time there was a slump in the market. This called forth a strongly worded proclamation from the prefect, in which he pointed out the folly of believing the story, which was most prejudicial to the farmers. It was urged that what were supposed to be claws were merely usually hardened feather stems."

Praying "Amiss"

LET IT be at once said that God is infinitely more concerned with the upbuilding of the character of His children than with the gratifying of their minds," says a thoughtful writer in the Christian. "Well-intentioned prayer is not always well-informed. The very things we ask for would, if granted in our present state, prove a moral handicap, and be the forerunner of disaster. It is of divine grace that we 'have not' what we 'ask amiss.' We have known children completely spoiled by the weak good-nature of parents who tried to do them at once everything they wanted. If human love may be entirely lacking in wisdom, the love and wisdom of God are one. When we are waiting for secondary mercies, it is in our power to make us know the value of the primary and spiritual. His delays are not indications of caprice, but of passion. If we can but wait in the calm content that 'your heavenly Father knoweth what is best for you,' we have need of before we ask, 'we shall come to the waiting time to realize the untrustworthiness of our own impulses, and to submit ourselves gladly to the freedom of his grand control. And we shall see that while seemingly inactive God has all the time been working in us, bringing us into moral correspondence with his will, which alone capacitates men to receive his gifts. In no other way than by seeming to be unwilling 'for a while' could he bring us to the fullness of absolute blessing. It is after his people have yielded the will of God that they receive the promise of blessing and patience."

The Children at Church

THE Go-to-Church Band continues to attract hearty approval of ministers because of its remarkable results at church attendance among young people and children. The pastor of the Norwood Congregational Church, Norwood, Mass., writes as follows:

The Go-to-Church Band was started in Norwood Congregational Church in February, 1915, with seniors, 35 intermediates and 20 juniors present on Sunday at morning worship. The children gave excellent attention even during the long sermon. They filled up the empty front pews; they were a part of the responsive readings and in the singing. In turning their Bibles they added much to our service, for they have become so much a part of us that we expect to enlarge the space of our auditorium next season because we do not feel that we would like the morning service without the inspiring and encouraging presence of the children. When I exchange an hour with no children present I feel as if one-half of the service had gone out of the service.

Children are everywhere except in the church. The church, in the old-fashioned New England meeting house where God's people need the children, often it happens that there is hardly a child present. There is no surer way to break up the cliques and the false distinctions which sometimes grow up under social lines under the old pew system, than to introduce a few children who may sometimes go to the wrong pew and win their way into some one's heart.

This Go-to-Church Band has proved itself a help to the old as well as to the young, to the minister as well as to the children.

An indirect and unexpected result of the establishing of the Go-to-Church Band in the Norwood Congregational Church has been the gathering of a morning congregation of some forty or more people who have not been accustomed to attend.

On the other hand parents have expressed appreciation of the movement. One father said: "My oldest boy attended Sunday school till he was sixteen years old, but did not get the church-going habit. Now he goes neither to church nor Sunday school. I cannot get him to go, he is 'too old.' I am glad we are beginning young enough with Bobbie."

"ALMOST immediately after preparing the above, a thrillingly regrettable news appeared in the press. 'Rev. Arthur Pingree, pastor of the Congregational Church of Norwood, Miss Helen Perkins of the same town were drowned while sailing here today. Mr. Pingree had charge of a party of Campers from Norwood. Two girls went beyond their depth while sailing; Mr. Pingree rescued one, but became exhausted in trying to bring Miss Perkins ashore. Both bodies were recovered. Mr. Pingree was 35, and Miss Perkins 16.

AFTER TEN YEARS

By MAY GRIGGS VAN VOORHIS

"E low to fetch that rug fer the parlor, don't ye, Jonas?" Martha Pemberton's voice had an anxious note, and she brushed back a stray lock of curling red hair from her forehead with quick, nervous strokes, a way she had when ed. The bent figure on the old farm wagon to bow a little farther still, as if Martha's question were a burden added to an al- umbersome load.

"I like to, Marthy," said Jonas dully, "but I've got to do the thing over and over, and to save my life don't see how I kin!"

"It you've promised," said Martha, indignantly, "high onto a year now that you've said you'd git some when our weddin' anniversary come around. You to need it so awful bad," she pleaded, changing her tone. "That carpet we've got in the parlor ain't no more seen, much less to put in your room fer company to look at!"

"Addin' anniversaries don't pay taxes," Jonas, grimly. "We're on the de- manded list already, Marthy, an' it's got to take all I kin rake an' scrape to pay that. Then the roof of the barn's been leakin' suthin' awful, an' the cistern's got to have a new pump by fall. It ain't like I'll hev the money fer nothin' new 'bout the house this summer," he added dully.

Martha stood looking at him through her blue eyes, her chest heaving, her mouth dilating. "When folks don't keep their promise it ain't no use to talk to 'em," she flung out at last, and strode away into the kitchen, shutting the door with bang. Jonas sat for a full minute at the closed door, wonder, anger, and humiliation written on his heavy features. At last he took up the reins with a hasty hand, and his big team shuffled away down the lane and out into the dusty road.

Alone in her spotless kitchen, Martha set about her morning tasks with dogged persistence. She poured the dishwater into the pan and an angry splash and jerked the un- yielding tea towels spitefully from their rack behind the stove.

"It ain't fair!" she said, hotly, to herself, as the glasses rattled into the pan. "Ta't fair nor right it should be so! Ain't I worked like a slave on this place day 'n' night for ten long year? Ain't I come to pay for the place and to build on the back rooms? Ain't I fussed with chickens and churned butter till my back aches to think on't? An' what's the use, can't even have a parlor rug when I see it? There's Mame Perkins was married the same summer we was; she ain't nary a tacked down carpet in her house an' she don't work half as hard. I do! 'Tain't fair ner right, an' of course Pemberton warn't that mean an' stingy it wouldn't be so!"

Over and over, in slightly varying phrase, she voiced the angry disappointment that surged in her heart, while the broom made its way, in short, vigorous strokes, over carpets already almost dustless, as the feather duster passed on it, nearly useless errand over mantel and old-fashioned chair. The parlor carpet, a faded and green ingrain, with worn patches and there cleverly hidden by tapestries of furniture, was given especially vigorous treatment; as if the active broom, in sympathy with her hand that held it, was taking revenge on the direct cause of so much unhappiness.

It is nearly noon when the cleaning was finished. Martha stood in the dining-room door that opened out into the side yard, to rest a moment and catch a breath of the sweet June air. It was a perfect June day. Roses bloomed at the door; a broad, green lawn stretched out toward the distant highway; and the great sun laughed in a deep blue sky. A light breeze rich with perfume, swept Martha's hot cheek and played with the straying curl upon her forehead. A grateful sense of peace swept over her turbulent heart as she sank down upon the doorstep; but a moment later she sprang again to her feet, for her neighbor had caught the sound of wheels at the end of the lane.

"Jas ain't comin' home fer dinner now," she observed, "an' me not a bite to give him!"

For a moment she knew that the light rattling sound upon the gravel was not made by Jonas's heavy team; and, before she could speculate further, a long, high-seated buggy, with shining red wheels, drawn by a meek little bay, had rolled into sight under the arching elms. A youth, perhaps fifteen or sixteen, held the reins, with a dark-eyed girl a few years younger at his side. A brand-new suit- case was strapped behind the seat. There was something about this shining yellow case, to say nothing of the glow in the happy, shy young faces before her, that sent a thrill to Martha's heart and kept her brushing and brushing the stray red lock with strange eagerness. Almost before the horse had stopped, the young man had sprung to the ground and was stand- ing before her, hat in hand.

"Excuse me, madam," he said, with boyish politeness, "but would it trouble you too much for us to buy our lunch here? It would be a real accommoda- tion, for we have come a long way since morning and—my wife—is tired!"

There was a hesitation over the magic word, and a flush on the honest young face, that made Martha catch her breath as she stepped forward with cordial hospitality.

"Ye're sure welcome to the best I've got," she

She had forgotten, in her fine enthusiasm, that roses do not bloom all the year, to right our wrongs with their beauty and their fragrance; and the strangest part of it was, that Martha had forgotten it too, and sat listening with all eagerness, her fingers wandering again and again to the straying curl on her forehead.

"It's like ye ain't been married long?" she asked with motherly interest. The girl's pretty face flushed a rosy red. "Only this morning," she said in a delicious tone of confidence, "and we're driving from Bedford to the city yonder, where our little home is all furnished and ready. Of course it's not a big place like this, and there aren't any roses there—yet; but it's cozy as it can be and I know we'll be real happy in it."

"O' course ye will," said Martha decidedly, "it ain't the house that makes folks happy, noways."

"That's just what I tell Frank," said the girl. "Some of my folks wanted us to wait till Frank had a bigger salary and could furnish a better home, but I wouldn't hear to it. 'We'll build up our home to- gether,' I said, 'and that will be one of the happiest things of all.' When I have to wait a while for something, I'll feel that I'm helping to earn it, don't you see? It isn't hard to do without things when you know folks would give them to you if they could. But here's Frank, and I've been so busy talking, I haven't even taken off my hat!"

What a sight it was, to be sure, to watch the boy's ardent face while the girl took off her hat at the little cracked glass in the corner and smoothed her damp, crumpled locks with small, deft fingers—a prophecy of many a similar scene in the little home that was to be! But much as she enjoyed it, Martha realized that she must not stand there gazing; there was a dinner to be made ready, and a wedding dinner at that. So, excusing herself with awkward confusion, she hurried away with no qualms of conscience about leaving these guests to entertain each other.

Scarcely a half hour later Martha, with a flushed face, with the refractory curl brushed back with surprising smoothness, and wearing a fresh, white apron, stood in the parlor doorway and announced that luncheon was ready. So the three repaired together to the pleasant dining-room, where the ample table, with its snowy cloth, had been spread close to the open side door. And a very substantial luncheon it was, to have been prepared in such an astonishingly short time! Juicy slices of golden ham, with their usual accompani- ment of fresh eggs, neatly browned; creamed potatoes, prepared by a master hand; radishes and crisp, curly lettuce from the kitchen garden; generous slices of snowy, home-made bread, golden butter, and jellies and preserves without number; a plate of delicious-looking cake, a pitcher of yellow cream, and a coffeepot, whose fragrance gave the final charm to the fes- tive preparations. Martha placed the two chairs and stood back, ready to serve, but the young people would not hear of it.

"Do sit down and let us wait on our- selves," said the girl. "You've gone to such a lot of trouble for us, and I know you must be tired and hungry, too. Then it's our wedding dinner, you know, and it will be lots more fun to have you share it with us!"

So Martha sat down and the meal went merrily forward. The young folks helped themselves freely to the good things before them, giving unstinted praise for all they ate, like the happy-hearted creatures they were. "And isn't this the prettiest dining- room, Frank?" said the girl, "with that nice big window and the roses blooming just outside the door? We're going to have a dining-room in our house too," she added, turning to Martha, "though there are but four rooms in all. I think it's cozy to take a bite in the kitchen once in a while, but I believe that right along a man does like to get away from the sight and smell of the cooking!"

Martha thought of the small table near the hot stove, where Jonas ate most of his meals "to save her steps," and her lips could not frame a reply; but the boy and girl, chatting away to one another, were too happy to notice her silence.

"I know we must owe you a great deal for this delicious dinner and all your trouble and kindness," said the boy, as they rose from the table at last, putting his hand significantly into his pocket.

"Now don't ye offer me one cent," said Martha, decidedly. "This heyar's a weddin' dinner, and said kindly, "though it ain't much, bein' es my man has gone to town fer the day, an' I 'lowed to git myself a bite come lunch time. Let the lady come in and rest; and since I ain't got no men folks about, I'll have to ask you to take the horse to the barn yonder. Ye'll find the second stall to yer right all cleaned an' ready with hay in the manger an' oats in the box."

It was a sight to see the "nice boy" lift his lady from her high perch with all the awkward gallantry of which he was capable; and it was a sight, a moment later, to see that same little lady, seated on one of the shabby chairs in Martha's immaculate parlor, making the little room shine with her gracious presence.

"What a beautiful place this is!" she exclaimed with cordial sincerity. "The trees and the grass are lovely, and the roses, oh, the roses are wonderful! I never saw such beautiful ones nor so many lovely varieties! What do you call that fragrant yellow rose that blooms by the door there?"

"I never heern its name," said Martha, much pleased; "Jonas's mother give me that rose ten year ago come fall."

"I mean to have one just like it at my door," said the eager girl; "for I know that if Frank and I ever should quarrel or have any trouble, we'd surely make it up when we walked out in the evening and saw these lovely flowers all shimmering and shining in the moonlight!"

Who Is It That Emerges?

AT a time of great confusion—a sudden surging crowd, on a street or covering a nation, or a continent, or a world, there emerge two or three leaders, sometimes only one, distinct from the rest, taking command of the situation, directing what must be done, compelling the crowd to calmness, bringing order out of chaos. During these months that the dreadful war has been raging in Europe, men hitherto little known, or altogether unknown to the world at large, have been thrust forward into places of leadership. Some have been as suddenly thrust out of power. Some have gone down to death. It is a time of fog and chaos and bewilderment.

Yet out of this world-wide confusion is emerging a stately and commanding figure. He, and he alone, has the answer to the mysterious questions about which the war rages; he, and he alone, has power to swing the contending nations back into the forsaken paths of brotherhood and prosperity. He has been greatly misjudged since the war began. Some have been so unwise as to say that the war itself is a proof that he is incapable of world-wide leadership. They say that the war proves him mistaken and powerless. But even while the words are in their mouth they know them false. They know that if his commands had been obeyed there would have been no war. They know that if the nations agree now to follow him there shall never be another.

When a man accepts his authority for the individual soul life, that life becomes wholesome and sturdy and fruitful; when a family accepts his rule it becomes sweet and purposeful; when a group of people seriously determine to follow him they find the path to peace and good; when various men or families or groups bring their problems to him for settlement, and solve them in accordance with the rules he has made, the settlement is right. It is only because Europe, accepting his authority for the individual life, accepting his authority for the home life, accepting, at least to some extent, his authority for community and national life, has rejected that authority when it came to international affairs that the continent is today plunged into the woes of war. It is because he was forgotten that men are bleeding and women weeping and the fields are strewn with dead.

Has he failed? Never. Men have failed. And they have failed because they forgot and forsook him.

Who is this that emerges from the smoke of battle, from the fog and mists of hate, from the deep gloom of grief? Who is this that, with patience and kindness and strength and wisdom unimpaired, offers to lead the nations back to peace and forward to brotherhood? Who is this that renews his covenant to make that peace perpetual and that brotherhood eternal? His name is Jesus.

Commission on Industry Reports

THE following extracts from the main report of the Federal Commission on Industrial Relations speak for themselves:

It has been proved by studies here and abroad that there is a direct relation between poverty and the death rate of babies; but the frightful rate at which poverty kills was not known, at least for this country, until last year, when, through a study made by the Federal Children's Bureau in Johnstown, Pa., it was shown that the babies whose fathers earned less than $10 per week died during the first year at the appalling rate of 256 per 1,000. On the other hand, those whose fathers earned $25 per week or more died at the rate of only 84 per 1,000. The babies of the poor died three times as fast as those who were in fairly well-to-do families. The tremendous significance of these figures will be appreciated when it is known that one-third of all the adult workmen reported by the Immigration Commission earned less than $10 per week. On the showing of Johnstown, these workmen may expect one out of four of their babies to die during the first year of life.

The last of the family to go hungry are the children, yet statistics show that in six of our largest cities from 12 to 20 per cent of the children are noticeably underfed and ill-nourished.

Between one-half and one-third of the families investigated by the Immigration Commission in 1909 "were living below the standard of decent subsistence, while about one-third were living in a state which can be described only as abject poverty."

With the inexhaustible natural resources of the United States, her tremendous mechanical achievements and the genius of her people for organization and industry, there can be no natural reason to prevent every able-bodied man of our present population from being well fed, well housed, comfortably clothed and from rearing a family of moderate size in comfort, health and security.

The crux of the question, says the report, is: Have the workers received a fair share of the enormous increase in wealth which has taken place in this country during the past quarter century as a result largely of their labors? The answer is, emphatically, "No!"

We advise our readers to get printed copies of the full report, which will be sent by the Department of Commerce and Labor to any one making the request. The entire report has not yet been made public, but will soon be available.

After the above paragraphs were written, the third section of the report was made public. This is the most important section of all, dealing with the great Foundations, the investigation of which was one of the commission's chief purposes. Some of the points of these last recommendations appear on page 894 of this issue and editorial comment on them will be made next week.

Protection against Plague

DISEASE is almost invariably an accompaniment of war. Plague follows in the path of the armies, and unless the most rigid hygienic system is observed, it takes a heavy toll. Austria, Serbia, Turkey and some sections of Russia have been fighting disease with varying success for months past. Cholera is spreading in the two first-named countries with alarming rapidity. Germany and France, though menaced by the contamination of water courses and springs, seem to have escaped serious trouble thus far only by ceaseless vigilance and through the adoption of the latest safeguards devised by medical science. In a few localities in the Balkans bubonic plague has appeared. Mexico is a point of even more immediate danger. Our health authorities will have need to be vigilant, to prevent the entrance of infection at American ports. The real peril may not become apparent for months yet, but the sooner precautions are taken the better.

The Cultivation of Cheerfulness

IT is related of Sydney Smith that one of his characteristic expressions, on rising to begin the day, was "Let us glorify the room," saying which he would fling wide his shutters to the morning sun. He took the simplest way of brightening his surroundings. So may we, by letting in God's sunshine to our own lives and hearts, get ourselves in tune to radiate cheer among those around us.

How seldom we think of cheerfulness as one of the most attractive graces of Christian character! We meet people with gloomy, woebegone faces, who look as doleful as though they had lost their hold on the joy of life. A sour-faced Christian is the poorest kind of an illustration of that faith the possession of which should make us radiate joy and gladness. Don't nurse your troubles. Don't grieve over trifles. Don't doubt God's goodness. It may rain today, but it will be fine tomorrow. The sun is always shining somewhere. Your troubles? How small they seem in comparison with those others have to bear. Yet from such ordeals true Christian heroism springs. Trouble and trial bring the nobler qualities to the surface, and that is doubtless the divine purpose in permitting them. The tree reared in a hothouse shelter is weak and puny and shallow-rooted. It is in the open, where the summer storms and winter blasts have full play, that we find the great deep-rooted, wide-limbed monarchs of the woods. So, if storm and stress should come, it is well to remember that they make for development of character. Welcome them and you conquer them. "If you can't look through your trouble," said a ripe old Christian, "just look over it. You'll always find help there."

So it is that the Christian who cultivates the habit of looking for the bright side seldom fails to find it. And he loves to bring others to the same viewpoint, that they may have a part in his pleasure. He learns the great secret of multiplying his joys by sharing them. Unlike the foolish farmer who hoarded his seed and kept it in his barn until it molded, he scatters his along the furrows and raises abundance. He knows that if we selfishly hug our joys to ourselves they soon fade; while if we pass them along to others, we have the satisfaction of seeing them spread and multiply and so gladden many hearts. Hence it is a good plan to scatter sunshine as you go along the road of life. To do this effectively, let us cultivate the habit of cheerfulness. A cheerful face always finds a welcome and makes friends everywhere.

Words That Will Vanish Like Smoke

WITH two small dogs rollicking around him and bumping against his legs, with fourteen hundred men squatting on the ground before him, many of them with cigars or cigarettes in their mouths, with a crowd of several thousand men and women standing or sitting on the outer circles, a man in khaki stood forth in a field among the Adirondack foothills and recommended that a certain class of American citizens be shot either from the front or from the back. At a time when the relations of two great nations were at the most delicate tension, when wise and calm men were doing the on both sides of the sea to make sure that truth, reason and justice and peace should triumph over passion and wrong, at what was more than any of the last fifty years of America's history a man for holding one's breath and speaking none but the calmest, most dignified, most carefully considered, accurately balanced words, this man in khaki, like a roaring volcano, made utterances calculated to create a class of America's citizens comprising at least one-fourth of her population and to stir to unconstrained wrath the people of the land with which we see at peace.

For this man in khaki was no commonplace citizen but one whose word for seven years was the word of our nation's highest authority and whose word had been listened to respectfully by the peoples and islands of the world.

The great peace-loving Christian Herald family tests. He should have come to that camp dressed as the private citizen he now is. He should have spoken moderate, earnest words; he should have scorned to hint that a great section of American citizens would be disloyal; he should have scorned to stir up the flames of war which earnest souls were struggling to quench; he should have scorned to vilify those who put peace and life and fraternity above all other issues; even though he may believe that one side of Europe's great conflict is on the side of liberty and humanity and the other on the side of bondage and destruction, he should have hesitated before showing out his animosities at a time when sober words are the world's greatest need.

But the deep common sense of the American people will value his fiery words at their true worth. They will forget his former authority, his former leadership. They will remember only the rolling clouds and the gleaming cigarettes, and his rash words will vanish in air like the smoke from the lips of disrespectful auditors.

A Woman's Strike

THE whole country heard with consternation that a one-day strike was to be called by 500,000 women workers of New York City. Viewed with abject terror the prospect of a similar nation-wide strike which, it was feared, would follow the New York demonstration. Now the whole thing has been called off, and New York and the nation breathe easily again. The strike was to have been ordered to prove the folly of the dictum of the antis and their allies that "woman's place is in the home."

But surely that October day, if the strike had materialized, would have been one long to be remembered. Fuming officials waiting to dictate important letters, strenuous superintendents and foremen waiting to set the machines of their factories going, police floor-walkers viewing with consternation hordes of shoppers before the counter with no salesladies behind them, hungry men storming in vain at lunch for food which there is no one to serve—these are items of the dreadful cataclysm.

It is interesting to note that the census of 1910 showed 586,193 woman and girl away-from-home workers in New York City. This included 177,000 stenographers and typewriters; 65,042 seamstresses and sewing-machine operators; 27,761 saleswomen in stores; 113,409 waitresses; 21,683 teachers. The prospect was full of all sorts of situations which almost delightful or most frightful to contemplate. Suppose all the men should get together and decide to discharge permanently the whole half million. What would happen to our metropolis then?

But the mere threat of such a strike won the direct point. Who can ever say again that woman's place is in the busy affairs of life outside of the home?

Comments by the Way

BELIEVING in the power of old-fashioned prayer, the leaders of the Laymen's Missionary Movement are asking thousands of men and women to pray for the National Missionary Conference which opens the first of its seventy-five great conventions here in Chicago, October 14. Individuals in private, families at family altars, pastors in their pulpits, attendants at church meetings, and groups specially organized are requested to persistent prayer for the campaign.

FEELINGS are strangely stirred as we read that Nazareth, the home town of Joseph and Mary, and the place where Jesus was brought up, is now a center of military preparation. Troops are being dug in the woods and pathways round about the town and preparations are being made for an expected invasion. The things and scenes that are inexpressibly dear to the Christian are even now in process of transformation. This little scene in the town among the Lebanon hills, which was for thirty years the home of the Saviour of the world, will soon be unrecognizable should the war wave pass over it.

Notable Crown Jewel

THE service of the conquered Boer leader, General Botha, to England in this war, and her appreciation of it, call to mind the story of one of the costliest of Britain's crown jewels. Having conquered the Boers, Britain proposed to set a record by giving them complete autonomy under the English flag. The Boers made it to express their gratitude by purchasing the Cullinan diamond and presenting it to King Edward VII. The superb gift thus became a jewel of the British crown, along with the Kohinoor, both stones of a value not to be reckoned in cash. The Cullinan stone originally weighed 3,025 carats (a pound and three quarters), breaking all records for gems of the sort. It afterward divided into nine huge brilliant-cut stones and a number of comparatively smaller ones. The Cullinan was remarkable also for its purity and color. This diamond had in it the heart of the people, the only crown jewel worth considering in any nation. Two jewels have often represented the vanity and pomp of kings and queens, sometimes the pride and luxurious play of dissolute men and women who have ruled. The warm hearts of a people are the real jewels of a nation. The precious stones to be shut in a chest, and taken out on a state occasion to blaze with glory at the coronation, as jewels to be used by the King are mentioned: "And they shall be with the Lord of hosts, in that day they make up my jewels." (Mal. 3:17.)

Getting Spiritual Results

The Evangelistic Committee of New York City, in its report has mentioned a number of incidents, among them the following: A would-be atheist saved. Twelve additions to the Sunday School. A Hungarian boy wins entire family to Christ. Fourteen Bohemians in training for church membership from one cigar stand. The singer at Madison and MacSquares was converted in one of his three years ago. Three Russians came with the Russian Evangelical Union and three more await admission. The present speaker at Madison and MacSquares was converted in one of his three years ago. Several admissions to the Hungarian Sunday School as a result of the children's "fence" meetings. A colored boy who for three years attended our "yard" meetings, provided upon the ministry as a life guard. A cripple who thought life barely worth living, converted at MacSquares and now glowingly happy. A Sunday school teacher, whose wife is a missionary in China, returned after many years wandering. A Harvard graduate, a lawyer, who for years has been separated from his family, converted in a street meeting. One hundred men stood on the street at Bid and Wall at noon one of the hot days this summer. About one hundred raised their hands for prayer. The groups of young people in one church trained in the Evangelistic Institute co-operating with it in auxiliary meetings, now hold five weekly meetings without our assistance. "Is our tent coming?" said a former gangster the other day. "We need it so much." This man, though he has been in prison several times. When asked to lend his friends would help to preserve order in the street, he replied: "Yes, indeed, we will." Can any work be nearer to the heart of Christ than this obedience to his command, "And the Lord said unto them, Go out into the highways and hedges and preach the Gospel to every creature." (Luke 14:23.)

Vegetable Waste, Cattle Food

NEW regulation in Berlin, Germany, requires that vegetable tops, peelings, and waste bread of every kind be kept separate from all other garbage and be collected and used as food for cattle. The city kitchen makes food out of much that an American cook would throw out into the garbage pail. Wonderful progress has been made in utilizing the waste forces in most of the industries of the world. The economies have been so nicely practiced that often the respectable profit of a concern is represented by the employment of its wastes. The great need of the church and of the individual Christian is the utilization of their waste forces—time, talent, opportunity. There is enough faith and love force in the church going to waste to save the whole world in an incredibly short time. The gathering up of the waste in Berlin as food for cattle calls to mind these words: "He said unto his disciples, Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost." (Jo. 6:12.)

TO SELL OLD GOVERNMENT SHIP PORTSMOUTH

THE United States Steamship Portsmouth, a wooden vessel 153 feet long and thirty-eight feet wide, of 1,125 tons, was built seventy-two years ago at the Navy Yard at Portsmouth, N. H. Her first cruise was in 1844 to 1849 to the coast of California, under the command of J. B. Montgomery, who belonged to the squadron of J. D. Sloat. The ship took an important part in the Mexican War, capturing vessels and landing men for assaults. She reached Boston from Valparaiso in 1849. This same year she was placed in the African Squadron, and from 1851 to 1854 she was in the Pacific Squadron. Perhaps the most exciting incident of the career of the Portsmouth occurred while she was in the East Indian Squadron from 1856 to 1858, under the command of Andrew Hull Foote. Commander Foote was engaged in the work of protecting Americans in Canton and in trying to keep them out of the trouble between the Chinese and English over the opium question. On November 15, 1856, while Commander Foote was rowing past one of the forts of the city, the Chinese fired upon him. The next day the fort was bombarded by the Portsmouth, and on the 20th, in company with the Levant and the San Jacinto, a further bombardment took place. Two hundred and eighty-seven men with four howitzers were landed, and crossing the rice fields they captured several of the forts, and the American flag was raised over them. The outbreak of the Civil War found the Portsmouth in the West Gulf Squadron with Admiral Farragut, commanded by S. Swartout. She was present at the passage of Forts St. Philip and Jackson, the occupation of New Orleans and numerous engagements on the lower Mississippi. After the war she was used as a quarantine and training ship at different ports. In 1911, being unfitted for deep-water cruising, she took the place of the hospital ship Jamestown at Hampton Roads; in 1912 she was declared as unfit for any use. The Naval Historical Society of New York City has obtained the stern ornamental carvings of this famous old ship-of-war, while the hulk, after more than seventy years of service, is about to be sold as junk. There is this reference to ships of war in olden times: "And King Solomon made a navy of ships in Ezion-geber, which is beside Elath, on the coast of the Red Sea, in the land of Egypt." (1 Kings 9:26.)

street car the other night, when his hat blew from his head and rolled beneath the car. The rear wheels passed over both of his legs. Poor fellow, to have his precious life put in peril in such a manner! He should have had the conductor stop the car and let him off. The cost would have been only a nickel. Or he could have let the hat go, which so late in the season was worth perhaps no more than a half dollar. People are so often trying to save the smaller at the risk of the greater, the things that the body wears at the expense of the body itself or the mind within it. There are so many that are trying to save the trifling straw hat, and risking their lives in so doing. The paramount importance of spiritual things is thus recognized: "Set your affection on things above, not on things on the earth." (Col. 3:2.)

Floods Near St. Louis

TWENTY lives were lost and considerable property damaged by floods near St. Louis, Mo., August 22. The flood area covered nearly a hundred square miles along the Meramac River. The river, lined on either side with thousands of pleasure resorts, club houses and summer cottages, went several miles out of its banks, carrying away most of these buildings. In Valley Park alone two thousand families were made homeless. The water was from ten to twelve feet high in the streets. The river was two and a half miles wide there and at Meramac Highlands, and four miles wide at Crescent. The same day there were disastrous cloudbursts in different parts of the country, notably in Sullivan and Orange Counties, New York. The reservoir at Ellenville, N. Y., broke, carrying away the Methodist church among other buildings. Severity as well as mildness is manifested in nature. There is the volcano's eruption, the earthquake shock, the terrible tornado, and the disastrous flood. The divine severity is manifested also in human experience, and in the Scriptures. The destructive flood is thus referred to: "Let not the water flood overwhelm me." (Ps. 69:15.)

Celebrated Scientists Dead

DR. PAUL EHRLICH, discoverer of salvarsan and of the anti-toxin for diphtheria, died suddenly at Bad Homburg, Germany, on August 20, at the age of sixty-one years. As chief of the German Government's Institute at Frankfurt, he was counted one of the most celebrated medical scientists in the world. At the International Medical Congress in London in 1913, Dr. Ehrlich was introduced by Sir Malcolm Morris as the greatest exponent of modern pathology in the civilized world. He received an ovation which lasted several minutes before he was permitted to speak. The decoration of the Second Class of the Red Eagle, with the star, was conferred upon him by Emperor William in 1914, and he was awarded the Cameron prize by Edinburgh University in the same year. One year later, on the same day of the month, Dr. Ehrlich died. Dr. Charles J. Finlay, another distinguished medical scientist, passed away at Havana, Cuba, at the age of eighty-two. Dr. Finlay laid the whole world under lasting obligation to him by his discovery of the yellow fever mosquito theory. It was in 1881 that Dr. Finlay promulgated his theory of the yellow fever-bearing mosquito, which was rejected by his contemporaries, and made him almost an object of ridicule. But he persisted, and in his practice upon himself he proved his theory conclusively, and in September, 1911, thirty years after he had made the first announcement of his theory, the medical world and popular opinion proclaimed him the discoverer of the fact that the mosquito is a fruitful cause of yellow fever, and placed him in the rank of the most benevolent medical scientists of his generation. What class of persons more unselfish, more tireless, more enterprising, and progressive than the physicians and surgeons of our day! The author of one of the Gospels was a physician: "Take the beloved physician, and Demas salute you." (Col. 4:14.)

Nine Stripes on Arm

A CONDUCTOR on a flier from the West into New York had nine gold bars on his left sleeve, indicating forty-five years of continuous service on that road. At eighteen years of age he began work on the roadbed with pick and shovel and worked his way up to the position of passenger conductor. When asked why he had had such a long service, he said that he had enjoyed good health, had worked for the road as though it were his own, had always paid especial attention to old people and invalids, had tried to practice the Golden Rule and to manifest a spirit of patience becoming the Christian man. It requires ability, tact, industry, and integrity to get those gold bars on the arm. They are a real ornament, an honor, to the man and the company both. It is this constancy in the divine service that is required: "Be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord." (1 Cor. 15:58.)

According to statistics gathered by the Department of Labor in Washington, we have in this country at the present time, 14,000,000 foreign-born persons who have not become naturalized. Eight millions of these are able-bodied men, 5,500,000 being of British, French, Italian, Polish, Spanish and Scandinavian stock and 2,500,000 German and Austrian.

FRANCE: THE WAR AND THE WOMAN

By RUTH WRIGHT KAUFFMAN

SHE stood in the center of the field, her skirts girded to her knees, the rough wooden shoes on her feet, one hand gripping a scythe, about her head a great cloth tied to keep the sweat from her burning eyes—this woman that I had last seen, a short year since, dressed as any small-town American might be dressed as she came from the morning service in the little Protestant church at Veynes. She was then the wife of one of the municipal officials, who had a farm that he worked with well-paid laborers; the mother of three manly sons. She was now a laborer on that farm—and its only laborer. "My husband?" she repeated the question that I had asked. "But he is at the front, of course. I have not heard from him for a month, but when last I heard he was still alive. The boys all went to the war. Pierre was wounded in Alsace and is now in hospital at Lyons; he will come home, but he will never see his home again; his eyes . . . And you remember what beautiful eyes he had, madame. Georges is a prisoner; it is permitted to write him nine words on a post-card, but what he most misses is bread, French bread, he says. Louis—Louis was killed; he was killed, madame, but I never heard where or how. I think that I shall never hear—you see, there are so many."

"And you?" I asked.

She made a patient gesture with her free hand. "Behold me," she said. "This tells everything."

It does tell a great deal. It tells something that the despatches from the front, the official communications and the brave declarations of government officials fail to tell. It tells a little of what this war means to the women of France, and must, in much the same way, mean to the women of every other country engaged in it.

That was what I went to France to find out: what the war meant to its women; and, from the woman's point of view, I found out a few things on the way that are also omitted in the general news of general conditions. They are worth a paragraphic pause.

When war was first declared, we all traveled back and forth over the Atlantic—save for the first rushes of refugees—more or less as we had always done; windows were curtained by night, and that about ended the precautions. Then came the sinking of the Lusitania and the precautions with which we are now all familiar along the northern route. But now—and this, I am told, is not published in America—the precautions taken over the southern route are almost as great as those taken over the northern, the southern route that we had all considered as safe as a railway journey between New York and Philadelphia. There are often no lights by night, the life-boats are unfastened from their holdings for instant use as one approaches the Mediterranean, and on my ship these boats were provisioned: not all the submarines, we were informed, had been bottled up.

THERE is no passing Gibraltar unnoticed. We approached the Rock one night with a southern sky full of stars above us and a light to the left that was Cape Trafalgar and one to the right that was Cape Spartel. A small Spanish town twinkled and went out. Tangiers seemed a shining inch of pin-heads stuck in a pin-cushion that was a blur of African mountains, and ahead the sky was less dark from the glow of the point to be passed. Beside me, on deck, stood a little French woman, called home to nurse her two brothers, wounded in the war.

"This is not the Mediterranean that I once knew," she sighed. "You remember how crowded the traffic used to be here. Now the waters are empty. I wonder if all Italy and France will be dark and empty, too."

An officer told us that wherever we saw three dim lights close together—two white at the masts and a colored one between—a silent ship was passing: our own illumination was similar.

Ahead a long, steady searchlight barred the gate to the Inland Sea: a light that grew in intensity with our approach, but seemed never to change direction. Then shadows crawled by through the darkness, and we slowly got the sense of eyes on every side—the eyes of watchful, half-seen cruisers. A sharp signal flashed from shore. We flashed an answer. Then abruptly, out of the blackness, a dazzling brilliancy touched the funnels of the liner, swept the deck, blinded us. It gathered force. With the deliberation of an expert duelist, it scrutinized us, sought the prow, illuminated the fore-mast and bridge, pondered the marks of identification, hesitated, swept back; and then, quite suddenly and out of nowhere, a ridiculously small torpedo-boat was alongside.

"Who are you?" bellowed an unmistakably British voice.

Our captain leaned over the rail with his megaphone.

"Paquebot Sant' Anna, Ligne Fabre, New York à Marseille."

"Who are you?" the darkness repeated, and not until the answer was made in English was it at all considered. There were two or three more questions and answers, and then a friendly "All right."

Bells rang, engines started: as it had come, the destroyer vanished; the searchlight shot away upon some invisible command, and we were left to crawl forward in a darkness that was a thousand times more intense because of the light that had gone.

I tell this incident because it was so symbolic of all that followed after our voyage up the coast and our landing at Marseilles. France was dark, and it was all the darker because I once knew it so well in sunshine.

FRENCH INFANTRY EQUIPPED WITH NEW SHRAPNEL-PROOF STEEL HELMET

AT first a stranger might have been deceived by the injuries of the country are internal in character, and anybody that did not know Marseilles and its ports would be deceived by the amazing spirit of the people, who seem resolved to keep their best foot to the world. Marseilles looked, as we disembarked, merely the prosperous cosmopolitan city that it always used to be. I was afraid to land, dreading the sight of the wounded, but Marseilles was reassuringly crowded, and the crowds in the street-cafes seemed gay. Soldiers were everywhere; there had always been a plenty of soldiers, and the only difference between these and the soldiers I was accustomed to seeing in Marseilles was that the majority of those now in evidence were the hugest, blackest, most beautiful negroes I had ever encountered.

But my opportunities were exceptional. I liked with a friend of my husband, a captain in the cavalry.

"So you think the war has not changed?" he said. "Come with me."

He took me to hospital after hospital. Outside, these looked as they had always looked; but once inside the doors, you saw that they were overflowing. Literally overflowing. They overflowed into the schools, which were full of wounded, nursed for the most part by volunteers from among the women of the city, and I was to learn later that nearly every school-house in France was similarly burdened, education paying its tax to war along with all the other activities of life.

I returned to the docks. There was the Canada, once of the Fabre Line from New York to Marseilles, now requisitioned by the French Government as a hospital-ship running out of the Dardanelles; her commander, Captain Bouleuc, known to many American travelers, had been left dying in hospital at Toulon, prayed over by his wife and daughter, whose son is at the front. I watched the German prisoners working on the quays, guarded by French soldiers with fixed bayonets, and loading cars with metal to be used for shells against their fellow Germans. I saw guided by the streets many French, who had been blinded, they said, by the vitriol-hurling in the mad attempt upon Constantinople. And then I went to the hospitals again. . . .

"Yes," I thought, "France will indeed be dark."

It is dark, but it is darker for its women folk than it is even for those men that have lost their sight at the front. The women are doing a three-fold work; they are performing their customary household duties; they are doing what time they can spare to nursing the wounded; they are carrying on the farm-work, the business, or whatever it may be, of their husbands for the support of their families.

From Marseilles northeastward and so on to Paris, France, after one leaves the southern gateway, is one vast hospital. The streets of every town are full of convalescents, with heads bandaged, with arms in slings, limping on crutches—all men that, a year ago, were in the pink of health and at the top-notch of efficiency, many of them, if they can be made soon to return to the trenches. Not a few have been back and forth from the front, wounded and healed, as many as three times. Batches of unwounded have been "lent" for a fortnight to till their fields. The hospitals are often full, but though there is adequate care of the war patients, there is no encouragement for the ordinary cases, for the care of which these hospitals were originally intended: civilian sick must take their chances in their forsaken homes.

The surgeons are overworked and I have already mentioned the conversion of the schoolhouses into hospitals. All the women of France are, in some way, serving their country, mostly I think as nurses; even the children help to serve; in a thousand ways war has swallowed life. Yet at the prefecture in Chambéry, I was told that I might officially say that no word of protest against the war has been made; war has become a normal condition.

It is not as if one city were affected, or one strip of country along the front: the signs of devastation are everywhere; the by-products clutter the highways. Travel is not easy; there are far fewer trains; troop-trains and

THE most interesting events of the closing week, August 26, have occurred in that portion of the campaign in Russia, south of an east and west line drawn through Kovno, the fortress recently captured by the Germans.

On the line of Kovno a part of General von Hindenburg's army has been moving to the eastward against Wilna, and after severe fighting at various points, notably at Koschedanj and Sholi, have reached a point but a few miles from where the railroad, which runs south to Warsaw and north to Petrograd, turns almost directly to the east and enters Wilna. For some time the Russians have expected to be driven from Wilna, and for the past three or four weeks have been stripping the town of everything of a portable nature calculated to be of use in war, and now the latest news indicates that they have begun to destroy all such class of things which they are unable to carry away for any reason.

From Kovno south to the outskirts of Grodno, there has been a general advance of the Germans during the past and a corresponding retreat of the Russians. To-day the course of the much twisting Niemen may be taken as marking the general position of the contending armies in this sphere of action.

Grodno is gradually being invested, and the Germans appear to be certain of taking this fortress.

Ossowetz, the fortress on the Bohr River, which alone of all the Russian strongholds has put up an energetic defense, was at last evacuated by the Russians during the week and the Germans took possession; which event insured the fall of Bielostock also. With the fall of Novogeorgievsk, mentioned last week, all the Russian fortresses and strong places to the west of the Petrograd-Warsaw railroad north of Warsaw passed into German hands.

In the sector to the east of Warsaw, toward Brest-Litovsk, several important events have happened which will have considerable influence on the fate of this fortress. The army of General von Gallwitz, operating to the north, captured Bielsk, on the railroad running between Brest and Bielostock, and moved to the eastward with the object of investing the east front of Brest, in conjunction with a portion of General von Mackensen's forces moving from the southeast front. From Bielsk a railroad runs to Stockok, a little to the southeast, from which place two (for Russia) good roads lead to Prushany, which is only a few miles from the railroad running northeast from Brest.

In addition, these two roads bisect all roads running easterly from Brest, north of this railroad, and consequently an advance to the railroad would cut off any Russian retreat by these roads, as well as by the railway.

If these movements are completed as evidently planned, Brest will be completely invested and any retreat therefrom absolutely cut off.

ON the other fronts of Brest-Litovsk, the northern, western and southern, the armies of Prince Leopold of Bavaria and the remaining portion of the forces of General von Mackensen, continue to make progress, and on these fronts it may be said that the Russians had been pretty well driven into the exterior defenses of the fortress itself and the investment was largely an accomplished fact.

On August 26 this great concentration fortress was evacuated by its defenders, who fell back toward Wilna, and the Austro-German forces are now in possession of that strategical point and control the whole line of the Cholm-Bielostock railway. This leaves the Russian retreat guarded only by Grodno and Wilna.

Farther south, on the Lublin-Cholm railroad, the city of Kovel has been captured by the Austrians, who have begun a movement northward therefrom along the railroad running from this city to Brest. Kovel is a real Russian city, like Cholm, and these two form the only two really Russian cities the Teutonic Allies have so far taken; among their population one will not find Jews, Poles or Germans, which is the case in all the towns of the north that have fallen.

North of the east-and-west line through Kovno, the land campaign has moved slowly and both sides have apparently been content to hold their positions while waiting for the completion of the naval activities in the Gulf of Riga.

The naval operations in the Gulf of Riga, first announced as a great Russian victory, are now known to have resulted in the loss of not a single heavy vessel engaged on either side. The fighting lasted four days, and was almost entirely between torpedo boat destroyers and vessels of that type, and some small auxiliary cruisers. In this fighting the Germans lost several destroyers and one auxiliary cruiser, while the Russians lost only one unimportant vessel. The German fleet, however, is obliged to withdraw from the Gulf, and this alone is a victory of great importance to the Russians.

The German battle cruiser Moltke is reported sunk in the Baltic by an English submarine; as this report has not yet received verification from official sources, I only give it for what it is worth. The Moltke is a sister ship of the celebrated Goeben, now in Turkish waters.

RUMORS reach us that a cabinet crisis is impending in France and that several important changes are about to be made: Viviani will probably remain premier, and organize the new cabinet, in which, it is said, General Joffre will be made minister of war. Venizelos is now premier of Greece, a new cabinet has been definitely formed and the oath of office taken.

The general Balkan situation, however, remains a puzzle beyond the possibility of solution at the present time. Absolutely no definite and reliable news from any one of the three countries of interest, Bulgaria, Rumania or Greece, has as yet reached us, from which to draw a reasoned deduction. Rumors abound, put forth one minute and contradicted the next. One thing is certain, that none of these countries will be affected in whatever decision is finally arrived at by sentimental cause: national advantage, which will take the form of territorial accession or money, will be their motives for action. Therein of course lies the difficulty, as in these respects it seems impossible to content them all, the amount of territory givable being limited.

London stated, in the latter part of the week, that it is feeling so optimistic over the Dardanelles campaign, which it predicts will be decided favorably for the Allies in a few weeks, that it is a matter of indifference what the Balkan States do. Italy has entered into this campaign and has sent some troops, perhaps 30,000, and some ships, to aid the Allies, but the effect of this yet remains to be seen.

The Dardanelles campaign during the past week was rather uneventful. First the Allies won some advantages and then lost them, and at the latter end of the week regained a portion of the ground lost, the whole change in position amounting to 200 or 300 yards. On the sea nothing of importance took place in the Straits themselves, but the British submarine which penetrated into the Sea of Marmora some time ago added to her laurels by sinking several Turkish vessels, including another transport.

Italy formally declared war against Turkey during the week, but still remains at peace with Germany, though diplomatic relations are suspended. This situation is a curious one.

The military critic of the London Times has made a computation of the forces of the central empires actually in the field at the present time, which is interesting. This gentleman, who, by the way, is a most distinguished retired general officer, divides these forces as follows:

Eastern campaign	2,000,000
Western campaign	1,600,000
Austro-Italian campaign	300,000
Serbian frontier (observation)	100,000
Rumanian frontier (observation)	100,000
Total	4,100,000

He also estimates the available reserves at from four to four and a half millions, who are being prepared at the rate of 800,000 every four months. If these figures are correct, the end of the war for lack of men is not yet in sight.

The Allies have declared all contraband of war. This is perhaps the most arbitrary invasion of the rights of neutrals the war has yet produced in a commercial sense; and, if rigorous enforced, will very possibly be productive of very serious results. Our sympathies stand to suffer greatly and it is difficult to see how this damage can be mitigated.

The Austro-Italian campaign is over with almost exasperating slowness and the gains of either side are now measured by yards. General Cadorna, the Italian commander in chief, announced during the past week that he intended to adopt the plan of trench fighting, with its consequent slow development on the Isonzo River front, that in front towards Trieste and Dalmatia. On the Tyrolean and Carinthian fronts the positions remain practically the same as two months ago, so insignificant have been the changes. This Austro-Italian campaign closely resembles Italy's last campaign, in alliance with Prussia then, against Austria.

The Turko-Russian campaign in Asia Minor has been very quiet, but there has been some activity in the Persian Gulf campaign. As both sides aim the advantage, the only definite thing that can be said at the moment is that there has been heavy fighting there.

It is a very difficult task to say anything new concerning the campaign in the west. The last week has been even more uneventful than the weeks before, and these four months now have been without important incident. A skirmish here, an artillery duel there, a little fighting with hand grenades, and the occasional explosion of a mine, seem to be the total of last week's operations. Such activity as there was was most noticeable in the region of Soissons in the Argonne and in the Vosges.

The British are said to have increased the number of men they have in France quite largely and now hold about a hundred miles of the line.

A considerable allied fleet bombarded the German submarine base at Zeebrugge, on the Belgian coast, during the week, with some result, and the French sank a German destroyer off the same coast. Arrangements are being made for bringing out in some form a large British loan in the United States, from three hundred to five hundred million dollars is the sum mentioned.

DIPLOMATIC representations made at Washington late in the month by the German ambassador have tended greatly to allay the tension created by the sinking of the Arabic. There appears to be good reason to believe that Germany will not only modify her submarine warfare along the lines demanded by the American Government, but may also make complete official disavowal of the attack upon the Arabic.

IMMIGRATION AND THE WAR

THE immigration problem, which for many years has been puzzling the politicians, reformers, civic, philanthropic and religious societies and national organizations, has been settled for the time, at least, by the European war. Immigration is restricted, not by any principle of limitation adopted by experts or enacted by Congress. We are given a breathing spell, time has been found for the process of assimilation to take place. Overcrowding has ceased. During the ten months ending with June 1915, instead of receiving immigrants at the rate of more than three hundred daily, as in the year ending June 10, 1914, we received only thirty hundred monthly, or at the rate of two thousand daily, a decrease of two hundred. During the same period, immigrants left our shores at the rate of two thousand a month or two hundred of the number admitted, making an increase for ten months of only one hundred. If we reckon the number of immigrants previously admitted who were deported during this period, the net result will be only 108,450. This is a fraction over ten thousand per cent for the entire country. In other times, as many have been returned at Ellis Island in two days. Even in the dull time, there have been returned at Ellis Island two thousand in one day, and of the number coming during the past ten months, 167,212 were received at Ellis Island, while of those returning from our shores within this period 142,600 sailed from New York harbor. The country has been given an opportunity for careful consideration of our relations to the immigrant. One can clearly hear the call to return from the old question of restriction to the equally important and heretofore too much neglected question of the treatment and protection of the alien after admission. Much is being done by the various agencies and societies, and by the Federal authorities. Commissioner-General Caminetti is taking a practical interest in the immigrant after his admission, just now, especially with reference to distribution and employment. "The Committee for Immigrants in America" has awakened an interest and aroused general enthusiasm over the tremendously important question of the naturalization and Americanization of the immigrant. Boards of Education in many cities are united with them in this work. Commissioner Howe and his associates at Ellis Island and commissioners and officers of other ports are giving encouragement to these endeavors and have inaugurated plans for improving the methods of receiving the immigrant and caring for those detained.

The Immigrant Work Committee of the Home Missions Council and the Committee on Home Mission Interest among Immigrants of the Council of Women for Home Missions are giving special attention to plans by which the denominational forces engaged in this work at the ports of entry may be organized in such way as to unify their work and bring it into effective co-operation with other agencies working toward the same end. The Y. M. C. A., the Y. W. C. A., and the W. C. T. U. are ready for co-operation with other Christian forces. JOSEPH E. PERRY.

TRANSFORMING THE ARCTIC TRIBES

from and that makes the house shake." She told him a lie, grudging him his part in the good dish that the bear's meat would provide. The meat was eaten by the other and sister. But the latter attempted to hide a few small pieces from her share at table in her boot and gave them secretly to her brother. She also told him at last where the meat came from and that he had really killed the bear.

One day late in spring, when ice and snow had melted away, the boy sat again alone in the very dirty hut. The sod-huts become indescribably filthy in spring, when all the dirt and grease accumulated and frozen on the ground during the winter, thaws out. On the west northern part of the coast, where wood does not grow, such sod-huts are still used. But the inhabitants leave them in spring and live in tents. Two tuliks (small bird—semipalmated plover) came near to the house, and he whistled to them: "O ye little tuliks, cannot you make me to see again?" Up to him one of the birds came into the hut, took the boy by the hand and led him down the beach into shallow water and shed his eyes. Then they asked him whether he could see anything. "Yes," he said, "I can see the outlines of the hills on the opposite side of the bay." The birds led him into deeper water and shed his eyes again. "What do you see?" he little white spot of sand over yonder," they asked him. "A mouse-hole," he replied. "That will do," they said. "For this there was no lack of meat any more at their house. After a few years he mother got old and weakly. To go to their hunting place they had to climb over a steep precipice. The son had to carry her there and back now and then. One morning the boy asked his mother: "Could you get along now without me?" She answered in the affirmative. After they all three had gone to the hunting-place again, the boy tied the end of the long line for the harpoon around his mother and then waited.

A large whitefish came near to the shore. That he darted and the fish at once began pulling the mother towards the shore. She resisted with all her might and cried for help; but neither of the children regarded her cries and soon the mother was dragged into the water. After while she appeared once more above the surface, looked toward the shore and cried, "Erniälumâ!" (My bad son's doing), then she disappeared. Gradually she was converted into a whitefish and is still attached to the other large one by that harpoon-line. Now and then this whitefish-double appears still today. But to whomsoever it calls out the "Erniälumâ!" that man or woman dies soon afterwards."

This fable from old heathen times shows that even children and parents were only "loved" when useful, and only tolerated if no hopeless burden. The Gospel of Jesus Christ has completely changed these habits; although not every one is really walking well-pleasing unto God, yet the whole spiritual atmosphere is influenced in a remarkable degree. And many among them have received not only the name of Christians, but have taken Christ himself into their hearts as their personal Saviour.

Much has to be done still. Want of independence is one of their weak points. Naturally they are inclined to easygoing and loitering. There is still an influence noticeable from the old immoral habits of their forefathers. On the other hand, the isolation of this coast and the consequent lack of uplifting influences from outside of our small circle is apt to hamper energy and zeal.

Pray for us, dear readers, that love and patience, wisdom and zeal, courage and enthusiasm be given us for the further lifting of the spiritual and moral life of our Eskimo people.

My Leader

WHEN earthly joys have all passed by,
And clouds are lowering in the sky,
Though oft by human hopes deceived,
I know in whom I have believed,
And although gloomy seems the day,
When traveling on life's weary way,
I know that he has said to me,
That "as the day thy strength shall be."

And so, while trusting in his word,
I lean upon my gracious Lord.
And feel whate'er my lot may be,
"Still by his hand he leadeth me."
It may be that the path is rough—
Still, if he leads, it is enough,
For on his word I will depend:
"Lo, I am with you till the end."

"Wine and new wine take away the understanding."—Hos. 4:11.

The drunkard is blind to his best interests, not only for the next world, but for the present. The following paragraph will sufficiently enforce this: "During the period from September, 1914, to April, 1915, the Russian savings-banks received deposits, the monthly total of which showed an average of 38 million roubles as compared with scarcely a million roubles for the same months of 1913-1914. This fact is ascribed to the absolute prohibition of the sale of spirits." What absolute folly, then, it is for a kingdom or an individual, in face of this fact, to spend money in the liquor which demoralizes the soul and empties the pocket, offering no compensation but a momentary exhilaration of the nerves. The drinker also blunts his moral sense. Else would it be possible for women, when drunk, to treat their babes as no creature of the forest treats its young? The fuddled is not competent to transact business, and soon loses ground amid the competition of the market. The drugged heart becomes full of unclean passions and desires, as its gutter is broken down at the door-way, and there is no resistance to the mad riot of unclean revulsions. And the spirit is steeped in a narcotic indifference to God and Heaven. Every reader of these lines determines here and now to adopt total abstinence for himself and prohibition for the state.

THERE are two ways in which the story of Benhadad may be applied to the temperance question. The simple facts of the story show that at least one of the causes of Benhadad's defeat was his drunkenness. The teacher may also point out that the liquor traffic in America is like this heathen king, Benhadad, attacking the health and welfare and life of the American people.

Toward Prohibition

IN the 1914 Anti Saloon League Year Book are found the following valuable statements of fact regarding recent temperance triumphs in the United States, the present situation, and the plan for the future.

The absolute prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes has been adopted by nine States (Maine, Kansas, North Dakota, Georgia, North Carolina, Oklahoma, Mississippi, Tennessee and West Virginia) having an aggregate population of 14,685,961.

The legislatures of thirty-one other States (Alabama, Arizona, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New York, Ohio, Oregon, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Texas, Utah, Vermont, Virginia, Washington and Wisconsin) have by law prohibited the sale of intoxicating liquors in certain classes of political subdivisions. Prohibition becoming operative whenever a majority of the electors in a regular or special election indicate by vote that they wish the provisions of the law to apply. Under the operation of the laws in these States, 26,446,810 people are living under Prohibition by legislative enactment.

In three other States (Arkansas, Iowa* and South Dakota) the legislatures have enacted laws placing all sections of the State under Prohibition except in political subdivisions where a majority of the electors indicate that they do not wish the provision of such law to apply. In these three States there are 3,693,201 people living in Prohibition territory.

In the States of Wyoming and New Mexico the legislatures have prohibited the sale of liquors in all sections except certain classes of incorporated municipalities. In still other States the legislatures have arbitrarily placed certain areas under Prohibition legislation, thus adding to the aggregate population in Prohibition territory.

The United States Government, moreover, has prohibited the traffic in Indian countries, in certain portions of the territories, in military forts and reservations, in the United States navy, in the national Capitol building, in National and State Soldiers' Homes and in other specified areas under Federal control.

As a result of the operation of these several provisions, at the present time more than 47,000,000 of the population of the United States live under Prohibition and more than 71 per cent. of the area of the nation is, by Federal, State or local decree, Prohibition territory.

One-half of all the people now living in license territory in the United States live in four States—New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois and New Jersey. One-fourth of all the people in this nation who live in saloon territory live in six cities—New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Boston and Cleveland. One-half of all the saloons in the United States are located in fourteen cities. There are fewer saloons south of Mason and Dixon's Line than there are in the city of Chicago. Thirty-six States of this Union have fewer saloons in the aggregate than the city of New York.

SINCE there seems to be no possibility of capturing these local strongholds of the liquor traffic for prohibition, the temperance forces of the country are now concentrating their efforts on a Prohibition Amendment to the Constitution. Congress amazed the country by showing a majority vote in favor of the Amendment, and its champions now hope that the required two-thirds vote will be won later than 1920. The Amendment once passed, must be ratified by three-fourths of the states. 36. And records of the states indicates that ratification will be won when the time comes.

Wealth, total taxable, $2,810,961,092. Rates, 2 per cent., or less, of entire population (thirty years ago 49 per cent. were illiterate—Feeble-minded—none in fifty-four counties—none in eighty-seven counties. Age 1-30 of 1 per cent. of population, or one for every 3000 well-to-do persons; less than 600 who state. Poorhouses—empty in thirty-eight counties. Jails—all in fifty-three counties are Prisoners—sixty-five counties have none State Prison. Criminal jury trials—none in many counties in last ten years. Grand juries—unknown; seldom necessary. Death rate—10.1 per cent., or seven deaths per 1000 population. Death rate nearly 300 per cent. lower than of any liquor state, even including those in Kansas and having therefore practically the same atmosphere and physical conditions.

The following comparison between Kansas and Missouri makes the prohibition picture still more vivid. Christian Herald readers in Missouri will thank us for helping their unenlightened neighbors to see how necessary it is for them to join the temperance movement and work valiantly for prohibition.)

Missouri has more natural advantages than Kansas, such as mineral deposits, fertile soil, more rainfall and a nearer market. It is a much older State than Kansas. Its population is nearly double that of Kansas. Missouri has three cities much larger than any in Kansas. Kansas there is hardly a town of 1500 population but has its electric lights, water and sewer system while in Missouri numbers of towns of from five thousand population have no paved streets, electric lights or water system. In Missouri the assessed valuation is $1,650,000,000. In Kansas the assessed valuation is $2,750,000,000. Missouri the assessed valuation is $300 per capita. In Kansas the assessed valuation is $17 per capita. In the panic of 1907, when the banks appealed to those in the West for money to ease up the situation, Missouri with its large banks in its large cities refused to send a penny to the East, while the Kansas banks sent together $50,000,000 and sent it to help the Eastern banks in their emergency.

In Missouri there is $20 per capita deposited in the banks. In Kansas there is over $10 per capita deposited in the banks. In Missouri one farmer in one hundred owns an auto. In Kansas one farmer in five owns an auto. In Missouri common labor gets $8 per week, and in Kansas common labor gets $14 per week.

Why these differences? In Missouri there are over 4,000 saloons into which the people of the State pay $80,000,000 a year. In Kansas there are no saloons.

AN editorial writer in the Philadelphia North American commented on the conquest of the liquor in Kansas, said:

It is this defiance of what other states have legalized as a necessary evil that has helped make her citizens the richest per capita in the country and the richest of all agricultural lands in the world; that has given her a permanent fund of $10,000,000 and has reduced her illiterate to almost nothing. Ninety-eight per cent of 4,000 school children have never seen a

I owe my clear complexion to Resinol Soap

After years of experimenting with all sorts of things for my skin, I began to use Resinol Soap. In a few days I could see a marked improvement.

It seemed impossible that anything so simple as washing my face twice a day with hot water and a delightful toilet soap could do more good than all those tedious, expensive treatments; but the fact remains that now my complexion is clear, with the natural glow of health and youth that I feared it had lost for good.

Resinol Soap does this, because it contains the soothing, healing medication which physicians have prescribed for twenty years, in Resinol Ointment, for the treatment of skin affections. This same medication gives Resinol Soap its rich brown color. All druggists and dealers in toilet goods sell Resinol Soap. For trial cake, free, write to Dept. 33-D, Resinol, Baltimore, Md.

A WORD SPOKEN IN SEASON

THE far-reaching influence of a single act of kindness has probably never been better illustrated than in the following incident, related by a business man in New York, of cultivated tastes, who, in matter of delicacy, does not give the names of the persons interested, although the whole record can be accepted as absolute truth. His hope is perhaps the incident may suggest to some one the thought and will to do a similar way—to say the right word at the right time and possibly by such means to bring about a similar happy result.

Some twenty-five or more years ago was stationed in a small town in Illinois, and attended one night a concert that was given at that place. Among the performers was a young violinist, about fourteen or fifteen years old, perhaps less. I was more than pleased at her execution and the glow which she produced from her instrument. After the concert I congratulated her father on his daughter's playing and skill. He called on me a few days and asked my candid opinion of his daughter's ability. My reply was that I believed that if she were given the best musical instruction and advantages she would attain a high standard. He said that although she had taken lessons for a number of years, he could not see that she had advanced much during the past year or two. I suggested to him that perhaps her teacher had taught her well, knew, and that she had been given some time for better and higher instruction. I mentioned a teacher of considerable reputation in Chicago and suggested sending her to him. He thought enough of this suggestion to act on it.

"Soon afterwards I came East to live, but managed to keep in touch, one way or another, with her progress. After a few years her father took her to Paris, and she was entered at the conservatory, from which in time she graduated with high honors. On her return to New York she made her debut here under Theodore Thomas, and scored a great success, taking her place at once as a soloist, with a reputation that has increased year by year. Her name, if I should mention it, would be recognized as that of a great artist. Such publicity could add nothing to her fame, but it certainly would take away from me the brightness of the thought that perhaps what I said at the time helped to influence her life towards the brilliant success she has achieved.

"We can, in our life and contact with our fellow beings, help them often with at least a word spoken at the fitting moment, which may change their entire life, by giving encouragement and incentive to higher thought and achievement. And when we reflect how little this is for us to do and how great is the benefit it may prove, is it not our duty and should it not be our pleasure to speak it, and even to search out and find opportunities to help others?"

In the war of right and wrong we cannot afford to be neutral.

You are Going to Meet a Most Delicious Grain-Food

This means you who haven't met it.

You cling to old ways, as we all do, until something suddenly shows a new way that's better.

Then the new way becomes the fixed way.

Whole-Grain Bubbles

The better foods are whole-grain bubbles—Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice—toasted and steam-exploded.

Better in taste—crisp, airy morsels, thin and flimsy, with a taste like toasted nuts.

Better as foods, because they are whole grains made wholly digestible. Made so by Prof. Anderson's process, where every food cell is exploded.

As dainties they are irresistible.

As grain foods there is nothing to match them. No other process compares with this in fitting whole grains for food.

A WEEK in the WORLD'S NEWS

A BRAVE SOLDIER SORELY HURT. On August 27, at San Francisco, the wife of Brigadier General John J. Pershing, U. S. A., and three of their four young children were burned to death in their home in the Presidio, just near the Exposition grounds. A son of five years was rescued by a negro servant and soldiers. Other members of the family and the servants escaped. General Pershing was at El Paso, Texas, in command of border troops, expecting to have his family join him there shortly; he is a veteran of the Indian wars and the Spanish-American war. Mrs. Pershing was active in suffrage and other women's movements.

CAMERA AND FILM MONOPOLY MUST DISSOLVE. The United States District Court, sitting at Buffalo, N. Y., on August 24, handed down a decision by Judge John R. Hazel, declaring the Eastman Kodak Company to be a monopoly in restraint of trade in violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law, and ordered the company to arrange for the discontinuance of the objectionable features of its business methods by November first.

FIRST ELECTRIC BATTLESHIP. The California, whose keel is to be laid September 10, at the New York Navy yard, will be equipped with electric engines, the first battleship of the line in the world to use electricity for propulsion. About 6,000 tons of steel will go into her construction, and her displacement will be 32,000 tons.

POSSIBLY ANOTHER ARCTIC TRAGEDY. The probable death of the explorer, Vilhjalmur Stefansson, and two companions, Storker Storkerson and Ole Anderson, all of whom started inland over the ice from Martin Point, Alaska, April 7, 1914, is reported by the United States coast guard and mail cutter Bear, which returned to Nome from Point Barrow August 24 without having heard any word from the party. The Stefansson ship, Karluk, was wrecked in the early part of the expedition while Stefansson was absent, and her commander, Captain Bartlett, and crew were thrown on their own resources. Four Eskimos of the crew later started north with others in the New Jersey, a gasoline schooner, and wreckage of the New Jersey has drifted ashore at Cape Thomson.

FIRE SAVES HISTORIC SHIP FROM JUNK SALE. After page 887 of this issue, giving an account of the old frigate Portsmouth, was in type, the famous old craft, while taking part in a naval parade at Boston, August 25, caught fire and was destroyed.

FINE SHOWING OF BILLS COLLECTIBLE. The Department of Commerce reports that the total exports from the United States in the fiscal year 1915, ending June 30, amount to $2,768,600,000 (almost wholly domestic products), an increase of 17 per cent. over the preceding year; in the same period, the report points out, Great Britain's exports decreased 30 per cent., the total for the year being $2,170,100,000. Thus this country for the first time leads in amount of export trade. The report gives the following interesting comparisons:

Years	American Exports	British Exports
1815	$ 50,000,000	$ 285,300,000
1835	115,000,000	443,600,000
1855	218,000,000	567,900,000
1875	513,400,000	1,370,500,000
1895	807,500,000	1,391,000,000
1915	2,768,600,000	2,170,100,000

Manufactured articles, exclusive of foodstuffs, aggregated $1,166,000,000 in the 1915 total, whereas in 1821 they amounted to only $8,000,000.

JUST SO THAT OUR RECORDS SHALL BE COMPLETE. If the Torch of Victory which the suffragists carried through New York State and then passed on to New Jersey is to play an historic part in the movement, we wish to keep up with its progress through the country; consequently, having previously announced the transfer of the emblem, we now mention that shortly after being deposited with New Jersey ladies the torch disappeared. It is just possible its custodians should have felt grateful for a tremendous amount of sentiment is needed in order to make a bronze flame fastened to a painted piece of wood glow brighter and brighter the farther it is carried aloft by eager women. Unfortunately, therefore, or otherwise, as the future will determine, the article, after many days of advertising for it, was returned to the New Jersey suffragists, the finder gallantly declining a reward.

PRINCETON ENLARGES ITS CURRICULUM. Beginning with the 1918 class, all students at Princeton must pass in "rescue and resuscitation" before graduation. This is a natural expansion of the obligatory swimming course introduced by physical director Dr. R. E. Raycroft. Thorough mastery of a drowning person and his rescue and revival, are to be taught by practical work in the water.

STATE CASUALTY INSURANCE A GOOD THING. The result of the first year of business by the New York State Insurance Fund, operating under the Workmen's Compensation Law, is summed up in these significant words: "The experience of the State fund to date indicates that the present rates, 20 per cent. under the average casualty company rates, are adequate to cover losses, to provide ample reserve and surplus funds and to yield substantial dividends to policy holders."

WELSHMEN AGAIN DISCONCERT BRITISH CABINET. Miners of the South Wales coal fields are again on strike, this time to the number of 25,000, with prospects of more going out; at the present writing it looks as if the settlement of the former strike by David Lloyd George, Minister of Munitions, will count for little, and the entire controversy between the miners and the government as to wages and continuance of employment must be threshed out anew.

IF BY ANY MEANS THEY MAY WIN SOME TO CHRIST. Nine missionaries sent out by the Presbyterian Church, five of them physicians, sailed August 26 from New York for service in Persia in districts which have figured in news of massacres. They are Dr. and Mrs. W. P. Ellis of Helena, Mont.; Dr. Mary Fleming, Hinsdale, Md.; Dr. J. D. Frame, Philadelphia; Dr. Mary J. Smith, Kokomo, Ind.; Dr. Rollo E. Hoffmann, Leipsic, Ohio; Mrs. C. A. Douglas, Portland, Ore.; Dr. Dwight Donaldson, Huntington, W. Va.; Miss Mary L. Cowden, Washington, Iowa. This party expects to reach Persia by September, going by way of Scandinavia, Finland and Russia. On the 27th, the American Board sent off to the Balkans the following eight missionaries: Rev. and Mrs. L. F. Ostrander, returning to Bulgaria; Mr. and Mrs. J. Riggs Brewster, for Greece; Dr. and Mrs. Mark H. Ward (representing the Broadway Tabernacle), for Turkey ultimately, but to study in Egypt until the Turkish Government again admits foreigners to the interior; Miss Mary L. Matthews, returning to Monastir, and Miss Edith Douglas returning to Samokov.

AMERICA'S ANCIENT RACES. The American Museum of Natural History will be the richer, as will all of us, by the discoveries of Professor Nels O. Nelson in excavating in New Mexico. About Santa Fe the scientist has uncovered 470 rooms of an origin running back to the time of the cliff dwellers, and at San Marcos he found more than forty stone buildings, and in their ruins many skeletons, utensils, tools, and uninjured beans, corn and other seeds. Great irrigation works were also uncovered in these villages.

LATEST SESSION OF THE AD INTERIM HOUSE OF GOVERNORS. About thirty states were represented by governors and former governors at the eighth annual conference held this year in Boston August 24-27—a self-arranged feature in our political system which bids fair to become, by custom at least, a recognized institution. The deliberations took their color from the present war spirit abroad in the world. National preparedness was announced as the chief topic. At the opening session Governor Walsh of Massachusetts proposed that greater initiatory powers in legislation should be vested in the gubernatorial office, and discounted fears of individual abuse of power by referring to "President Wilson's conservative but influential exercise of executive power, which enables him to walk the narrow and difficult path between the honor of the country on the one hand and its peace and happiness on the other." We should say offhand that this tight-rope figure is not well chosen, for the honor, peace and happiness of the country are indivisible. Former Governor Adams of Colorado opposed the suggestion as tending away from democracy, and declared that no man had any power which he did not exercise to the utmost. On the whole, Governor Walsh's proposal was well received. On August 25 delegates were entertained by a brilliant naval review in Boston Harbor, in the course of which the frigate Portsmouth was burned, as noted elsewhere on page. Secretary of the Navy Daniels addressed the gathering in favor of a greater navy. Delegates discussed the country's naval efficiency and were in favor of measures to strengthen our defenses, but no specific recommendation to that effect was adopted. Other matters of national importance were including that of conservation of our national resources, simplification of court procedure and economy and efficient government. The session was notable also for the splendid entertainment provided for these distinguished guests. Salt Lake City was selected as the place of meeting next year, and William Spry of Utah was elected chairman of the Executive Committee.

THE BIBLE CONGRESS. The Bible Congress at the Exposition, San Francisco, held on August 1 to 4, was a success and has called the attention of the country to Bible translation and circulation throughout the world and pointed the way to next May's observances celebrating the one-hundredth anniversary of the foundation of the American Bible Society.

The Bible Congress, several of the delegates being unable to attend, was held in the city of San Francisco. There were delegates from the British and Foreign Bible Societies, and the Patriarch of Constantinople and his bishop, Kuyper, formerly President of the Netherlands, and now a member of the Reformed Church in France and others. The development in Europe and in America was being reached with data from Dr. H. Dwight's forthcoming book, "The Story of the American Bible Society for One Hundred Years."

PASSED ALONG THE COLFAX COMMISSION. "With what a sense of shame and humiliation the militarists look upon the founders of this government when they view the thousand-mile boundary between this country and Canada. Not a fort along the whole line; not a battleship on the Great Lakes; and here we sit supinely, a nation of millionaires not knowing at what moment the Canadians may rush in and take what a stimulus to business it would have been if the frontier had been fortified, like that between France and Germany. We could have spent billions of dollars in forts and battleships and furnished employment for hundreds of thousands of men. All these blessings are denied us, because the Father of the Republic cravenly agreed to leave the international boundary unfortified."

INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION'S ATTACK UPON CONCENTRATED FINANCIAL POWER. The voluminous report of the United States Commission on Industrial Relations, which was made last week, deals in its final section the industrial power over the lives of millions of workmen. The Commission declares to be one result of present conditions in the industrial world. The United States Steel Corporation is an example of concentration of final authority, 57 per cent of its stock being owned by 1.5 per cent. of the 100,000 shareholders. The final control resting with a single private bank. The "trust" foundations, which were put under searching investigation, are held to contain a menace to free industrial expansion, the Commission declaring that the funds of the Rockefeller and Carnegie foundations, amounting to at least $250,000,000 and yielding an annual revenue of over $13,000,000, are largely invested in securities of corporations dominant in American industry, and "the effect of these foundations must inevitably be colored if not controlled to conform to the policies of such corporations." And the Commission goes on to say that these funds represent largely the result of the exploitation of American workers through the payment of low wages, or of the exploitation of the American public through the extraction of high prices, and the argument deduced therefrom that these funds properly belong to the American people. The Commission calls the attention of Congress and of the country to the relations that apparently exist between such Foundations and industrial development. The social service objects claimed by the Foundations are declared not to be the real basis of their existence; and that in their operations they strike at the very independent thought through educational institutions, is a WAR DEPARTMENT TAKES NOTE OF COLONEL ROOSEVELT. Secretary of War Garrison on August 3, addressed a note to General Wood, in command of the training camp at Plattsburg, N. Y., taking stern exception to giving of an opportunity to ex-President Roosevelt to visit the camp, and forbidding the extension of similar opportunities to any one else who might employ it with "such unfortunate consequences." Secretary Garrison states that he did this in consultation with President Wilson. General Wood was responsible for Colonel Roosevelt's language, but for having furnished him the opportunity to present to the men any message not essential to the training they were there to receive. In this connection, Colonel Roosevelt makes the point that the Secretary of War knew, three weeks in advance, that he had been among other civilians, to address the encampment, and did not now shift the responsibility to General Wood. We are part with this view, as the sole responsibility for the invitation to address at Plattsburg devolves upon the only living ex-President we at present have in our midst, Colonel Theodore Roosevelt.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is published weekly by The Christian Herald, at the Bible House, Fourth Avenue, 8th and 9th Sts., New York City. QUARRELING IN THE HOME

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

WAS three minutes late for the train," said Dorothy, disconsolately.

"No," corrected her brother "you were four minutes late." Brown appeared on Dorothy's usual little face.

"Three minutes," she reiterated firmly.

"I suppose," said the brother angrily, "I suppose I wasn't with you? I suppose I know that it was four minutes?"

"I banged heavily on the table," the mother came out of her reverie.

"I don't stop quarreling you mustn't!" she remonstrated, "child!"

"I am very, very nervous to have fuss about little things. I won't do it!" Her voice rose shrilly with passion.

"That's right," said the brother, agitatedly; "that's right! Side with me. You always do!"

"I don't either," answered his mother, "I beam shone from her usually eyes. 'I wasn't siding with any-'"

"I merely wanted you to stop!" cried the father pushed back his chair from the table.

"You don't seem to be helping me," he remarked. "I guess I want any dessert. This eternal quarrel."

The door slammed behind him.

It is the accurate—all too accurate—portrait of the scene that is everywhere, in a vast number of American homes.

I have known unhappy families who might have been very happy instead if they had been argumentative and quarrelsome; if they had been tactful with their instead of thoughtless.

One knew two elderly maiden sisters who lived together in perfect peace and tranquillity, although they had nothing in common—no two alike.

I knew for a fact that they differed in their ways of looking at the most unimportant issues of life. I often wondered how they managed to get along without ruffling each other's hair.

One day I gathered up my courage in hand to ask them, "many homes," I said, "are quarreling over little matters—wonder how you manage to be so pleasant always?"

They waited for my answer, the sisters looked at each other in silent understanding. Then suddenly they both together—laughed so heartily and so heartily that I, perforce, laughed.

It was a moment before the oldest answered my question.

"Isn't a short story," she told me, "I'm sure that you'll be interested. You know, sister and I are very different, almost, as two could be. She is a suffragette, I am an 'anti'; she likes light and music and gaiety, while I am content to stay at home with my and my knitting. I remember, as tiny girls, we used to quarrel, and come to blows, because we wanted to play the same games, and to the same places, or eat the same food. It went on for years; and I used to fuss about our and our enemies and our amusements. We didn't strike each other, as I when we were children, but we couldn't think of mean things to say—and I remember myself throwing one of the best tea cups on the floor in a fit of rage against her.

"Then father and mother died, and we were left alone in the big house. We hadn't lived together long before I realized that the quarreling had to stop—that it was actually too much of a mental strain. One day I sat down opposite sister and we talked it all over. The upshot of the matter was, that we decided on this plan of action:

"If one of us says something that the other doesn't agree with, instead of beginning to argue and disagree as we would have done years ago, we shut our mouths tight and count up to fifty, and after each number we say to ourselves—Is it worth it? like this—'One—is it worth it? Two—is it worth it? Three—is it worth it?'"

"We do that all the way up to fifty—unless before that we see we have nothing to quarrel over, and if we decide by fifty that it is worth while to disagree and be unpleasant, we do disagree and we are unpleasant. But," and the elder sister laughed joyously at the happiness of life, "it's remarkable how seldom we find—after counting fifty—that it is worth it."

I wish that everyone who is prone to argue or quarrel or quibble would count up to fifty as the maiden sisters do. Because, if a person gets up to the twenty-fifth "is it worth it?" they are pretty sure to find that it isn't!

I RECKON that a great many business and professional men and women fail to do their best work because there is quarreling in their homes. Perhaps a stray word at breakfast about one's necktie or hairfix or point of view or even table manners has lost to the world many a beautiful sonnet or exquisite painting. I daresay that a great many round silver dollars have never been seen by efficient men who were not efficient enough in home affairs to keep from making one little remark that led to an argument, which, in turn, led to a headache and a crying spell for their wives and a fit of nervous depression for themselves.

"A constant dropping weareth away stone," says the greatest book—"a constant dropping weareth away stone!"

A constant quarreling will wear away a heart of gold, and a mind of steel. A constant quarreling will wear away mutual trust and understanding and faith. A constant quarreling will wear away happiness and content, and, in time, love.

Divorces are not always asked for because the husband or wife has committed one large, bad act. Many men and women find out they are not suited to each other because day after day, week after week, month in and month out, there is a constant round of petty arguments and quarrels. Many friendships and engagements have been broken for that reason. Many happy homes have gone up in (figurative) smoke for that same reason.

Oh, friends of mine, no matter if you are a brother or a sister or a mother or a father; if you are a husband or a wife or a son or a daughter; when you see the tiny glimmering start of a family quarrel (and most of the starts are tiny), be tactful enough and tolerant enough, and just plain kind enough, to shut your mouth hard, and count fifty to yourself. And after every number, say—like this—"Is it worth it?"

A JAPANESE WOMAN BANKER

Letter from Rev. Robert E. Speer from the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, New York, the writer says:

Years ago, when I was here, audience small and the government schools were to Christianity, the churches were and the forms of worship ragged, and the of the nation was distinctly anti-Christian.

Now, great congregations come to preaching. Worship has grown far more. The nation openly confesses its need of God. I wish you could have seen the eager of the students, or looked at that great of attentive men in Osaka and heard old

Mr. Morimura, the millionaire business man from Tokyo, speak to them of the nation's moral needs, which could only be met by faith in God. Another interesting character whom we met was Mrs. Hiraoka, a member of the great Mitsui banking family. She herself owns a number of banks. She is a little, energetic, bustling woman, very masterful in her ways, who made old Mr. Morimura and the rest of us stand around and take our seats. She is greatly respected and absolutely fearless, and travels all over the country now, preaching to men and so on. She goes right into her own banks and holds evangelistic meetings.

Questions and Answers

N. T. P., Ohio. How can one have harmony between one's higher and lower self?

David prayed a beautiful prayer in the 11th verse of the 86th Psalm. "Unite my heart to fear thy name." Charles Wesley prays for "A heart in every thought renewed,

And full of love divine;
Perfect and right and pure and good,
A copy, Lord, of thine."

Scripture promises for the cleansing of the heart from sin are numerous and positive. But the fact remains that even after the heart has been cleansed by the power of the Holy Spirit, a struggle goes on with one's lower or animal nature. The heart itself, that is, the will and the affections, may be united and consistent, but the body has tendencies away from the right. So long as life lasts there will be this battle between the body and the soul, the battle described in Paul's strenuous words in I Cor. 9: 27 (American Version): "I buffet my body and bring it into bondage." But the struggle with the bodily impulses need not disturb our Christian peace. It is different from the struggle James speaks about in his reference to the "two-souled man." This is a good translation of his phrase, "double-minded man." That is a terrible and grievous situation, in which a man's inmost soul is divided, part set on the good and part set on the evil. But when we receive the blessing of a "united heart," when we have what Jesus called the "single eye," then we may set ourselves jubilantly to face the struggle with all the forces that would oppose us, including our own physical nature, knowing that we shall be constantly "more than conquerors through him that loved us."

F. M., Ohio. 1. It was certainly unfortunate that you allowed your contemplation of spiritual things to make you less efficient in your work. Christians should be constantly on their guard about this. Christ offers to make us better rather than poorer workers at life's common tasks, and there is every reason to believe and not the slightest reason to doubt that he was a first rate carpenter. And he surely would like all his followers to do their work well. Paul urges his friends not to be "slothful in business" (Rom. 12: 11), and John commends the well-beloved Caius by saying (III John 5): "Beloved, thou doest faithfully whatsoever thou doest." There was no reason why you should have lost your happy religious experience by trying to be more careful with your work. You were simply tempted and perplexed by the evil one, and allowed him to overthrow your faith. You should again make a complete consecration and trust Christ for full salvation. Then ask him moment by moment to help you in your work, realizing that you will be bringing credit to his name by doing it well. 2. The best lives of Paul with which we are familiar are Stalker's, and Connybeare and Howson's. These may be secured from any denominational or general religious book publishing house.

Mrs. A. F. L., Des Moines, Iowa. 1. While there is no absolute evidence in the New Testament that Peter ever was in Rome, Eusebius, in the "Chronicon," says he visited it in A.D. 42, and Jerome also refers to such a visit, though without stating the year. Caius, Irenaeus, Origen and Tertullian all agree that Peter went to Rome, and Dionysus of Corinth writes that Peter and Paul suffered martyrdom together in Italy. Roman Catholic writers claim that he lived there for several years, but this assertion is wholly unsupported by evidence of any sort. 2. The archangel Michael is described in Dan. 10: 13-21 as having special charge of the Israelites as a nation. The Jewish rabbins regard him as the chief of the seven archangels. One solitary commentator, so far as we can learn, ventured the idea that Michael was the Son of God, but this view is rejected unanimously by all authorities.

A Friend, Montana. For thirty-nine years I have been a faithful servant in duty, in self-denial, in personal sacrifice in both the natural and spiritual life. Religiously I laid down my life for the lost and unsaved; they were saved, and I suffered the crucifying cross, where God could use me so that they might be saved. And for so doing I have suffered the loss of all that made life worth living for me. With this testimony given, what is the privilege of a child of the Eternal, when the soul's life is set free in full?

We have quoted at considerable length from this letter because it touches one or two points at which many Christians fail. We do not wish to detract anything from the splendid record of service and sacrifice outlined here. It has been noble, and the reward will be generous. There can be no doubt of that. But we cannot help fearing that our friend will miss something of the sweetness of the reward, if she thinks so much of the reward itself. There is a little suggestion of complaint in this letter—as though the trials had been too hard, the sacrifices unreasonable; and as if there were after all some doubt as to whether the rewards would be adequate. All such thoughts and fears and doubts not only needlessly lessen our joys here, but will to some extent spoil our pleasure when the reward is received. We shall be sorry to have thought for a moment that our gracious Lord might treat us with anything but the most superabundant generosity. In fact any definite thought of reward mars the perfection of our service. When Lynette asked Gareth what reward he wished, he cried:

"None! For the deed's sake have I done the deed."

The most perfect service springs from love, love that forgets itself completely in ardent desire and effort to help and bless. Love for Christ, love for those for whom he died and to whom he sends us—these are the true motives of service. As to the sacrifices, they never approach the grievousness of Christ's sacrifice for us. Friends of the Rev. Charles E. Parker, the humble, flaming evangelist-pastor of India, whose work has had so much to do with the amazing revival that is thrilling that whole nation, have heard him say, when questioned about some of the terrible sufferings and privations of his early years there: "I always knew that my Lord was bearing the heaviest end of the load." Paul has been somewhat misunderstood in this matter. The real purpose of Paul in recounting his sufferings and sacrifices was to convince others of the soundness of his teachings. Opponents questioned his authority and tried to undo his work. Paul said his sufferings proved his right to the title "slave of Christ," and gave him the right to teach. Even in his boasting he was thinking of others. He yearned for their salvation; he said he would be willing to be himself accursed, forfeiting all rewards and suffering any penalties, if only his brethren might be saved. And he insisted that his trials proved his sincerity, his apostleship, his soundness as a teacher of eternal truth.

Mrs. W. C. C., York, Neb. 1. Cornelius was doubtless "saved" before Peter came to him. According to the narrative in Acts he was approved of God and had his prayers answered. But the peculiar gladness and power of the Gospel he had of course not yet received, because he had not heard the story of Christ's life and death and had not received the Pentecostal blessings of the Holy Spirit. 2. There is no Scripture warrant for the use of the term "Reverend" before a minister's name. But neither do the Scriptures forbid it. It is a purely social and ecclesiastical matter, the churches and society choosing to address ministers in this way to signify their sacred calling. 3. The term "Comeouters" seems to be used popularly in two different ways. More correctly it is applied to Christians who believe that they should not be affiliated with any denomination at all. But it is often applied to people who may leave one denomination either to form a new denomination or to affiliate themselves with a smaller or stricter sect than that to which they belong. 4. Jesus did not stipulate that his followers should have a fixed salary, but he did state that "the laborer is worthy of his hire."

F. G. M., Corvallis, Ore. 1. Under our Constitution a man's religion is no bar to holding public office. All religions stand on the same level in that respect. The Church of Rome, however, has brought religion into politics. In a number of States, it has made campaign capital of religion. It has declared, through high church officials, its purpose of "making America Catholic," and this is a menace which the American people, of all classes and denominations, resent and oppose. It is true that in the diplomatic service, in Federal and municipal offices, in our courts, in the teaching staff of our public schools, there are many Catholics. The evil comes when they use the influence attached to their position to advance Catholic interests, and this, we fear, is being done to a dangerous extent everywhere.

Mrs. J. A. K., Pontiac, Ill., writes that this is a time when we, as a nation and as individuals, would do well to search our own hearts and ask if our sins are any less serious than those of the people of Europe who are going through the awful visitation of war. She suggests that the Christian Herald Family and all of God's people in this land unite in a day of prayer, that the nation may repent of its sins, its inordinate love of pleasure and its profanation of the Lord's day, and that it may be in the path of obedience hereafter. Such a theme might well engage the attention of pastors generally.

Inquirer, "South American Baby Boxes." Mr. Frank L. Brown, author of the article in which reference is made to these "boxes," explains the same as follows: "In practically all South American cities will be found openings in windowless buildings. These apertures are wide and deep enough to permit the placing there of an unwanted baby. The little one is dropped in the open side of a half barrel or box just within the aperture. The one putting in the baby cannot be seen. The barrel is rotated on the inside by baby taken out and no questions are asked. These babies are usually put in at night. Of these institutions the babies were said to off like flies. This is not true of all, for the plan is to care for the children until grown then place them out. The Society of Beneficence is reported as responsible maintenance of many of these building charities similar to this are supported in the profits on the public lottery system is continent-wide. Such a convenient disposal of babies fosters the spirit of immorality which is one of the curses of that continent.

D. J. M., Pennsylvania. Yes, Esperanto is used by a great number of people for international communication. There were over a hundred periodicals published in it before the war. Number are still published. It is not difficult to learn. It is much easier than any other national language. There are a number of text-books of Esperanto, which you can buy by writing to Fleming Revell & Co., New York.

F. W. C., Gloucester, Va. You are in correct in speaking of one of the buildings of the College of William and Mary, Virginia, built in 1693, as being the oldest school building in America, but if we are not misinformed the structure is in part only, the original building whereas the Dumer Academy school mentioned in our issue of July 21, is, we understand, all the original building erected in 1693.

American Dyes. A correspondent in Georgia, calls attention to the prolific growth of plant indigo in her vicinity, thick enough to cut with a mower, and suggests that this need not be dependent on a foreign land for dyestuffs. Many housewives still know how to make their own fast blue dye from this natural supply that the plant is practically negligible for industrial purposes; 85 per cent of the world's consumption of indigo is now made and mostly in Germany.

E. E. W., Troy, N. Y., writes: "Some one in the Christian Herald that the year 1915 will be divided into thirteen months. I think well enough as it is. I would not want my lord to come around for his rent thirteen times instead of twelve each year."

E. F. G. M., Cooperstown, N. Y. Although services you conduct are undenominational, would be better for you yourself to have a connection to some denomination. You would then meet the requirements of that denomination in regard to the right to administer the Lord's Supper and perform the rite of baptism. The state government can give no such authority.

E. R. R., Florence, S. C. There is no contradiction between the "blessed" of Psalm 1: 1 and the "blessed" of Psalm 32: 1. Blessed means happy, a mental state of contentment and joy, a condition of comfort and safety upon which a man is congratulated. Now both these classes of people are in this state—both the man who either by life habit or at any particular crisis or in old age has done no wrong, or the man who has done wrong and is pardoned.

Then besides, it's my wedding anniversary too (I was married ten years ago this very day); so we'll call it a double celebration of ye don't mind."

"We meant to pay you," the boy began; but the girl caught a glimpse of Martha's face and cut him off with a tautful "It's just lovely of you to do it, and we thank you ever and ever so much!"

"Ef ye'll leave me yer address," said Martha to the girl as the boy went back to bring around the horse, "I'll send ye some o' them thar yellor roses to set out in the fall. The fall's the best time to be a-settin' things out, an' ef ye kiver
'em clost with straw er leaves, the cold won't hurt 'em. Jonas goes over to the city right often (he's thar today), an' he'll be right proud to fetch 'em over to ye."

"I'll be so glad to have them," said the girl with genuine pleasure shining in her eyes, "and every time I look at them I'll think how kind you were to Frank and me on the very happiest day of all our lives!"

Martha stood in the doorway and watched them drive away down the lane, the neat straw hat and the pretty turban held very primly side by side. But even as she looked, the straw hat was disappearing in the direction of the turban; and it seemed to Martha, even at that distance, that she could see the slender blue shoulders trembling with the wonder and the glory of it all. And why not? Hadn't she and Jonas felt just so when they drove up that very lane ten years ago that very day?

"It's not much of a home for a gal like you," Jonas had said, pointing to the tiny three-room cot that stood where their comfortable house was standing now.

And she had answered—oh, yes, she had!—"It don't matter about the house, Jonas, so long as you an' me kin live together in it. And now—"

"Sakes alive! The tea kittle's a-bilin' over an' the dishes a-standin' on the table just like they wus!"

Late that evening, as a golden moon was rising over the eastern hills, a tired man, looking still more wan and bent in the moonlight, turned his lumbering team into the lane that led to the Pemberton home. But just as the horses passed out from under the sheltering elms, he raised his head and threw back his shoulders with a start of surprise. Instead of the one dim lamp that generally lighted his home-coming, the little house before him was ablaze with light; and, as he passed the window, he caught a glimpse of a daintily set table in the dining-room, and of Martha, flitting to and fro in her second best white dress. What could it mean? His brow darkened as he considered.

"It's company, most likely," he said to himself; "Eben's folks with a pack o' kids, er old Uncle Elliot with his meanderin' talk! It's a pity a man can't rest even at home!"

"Who's in the parlor, Marthy?" he asked in a cautious half whisper, a few moments later, opening the kitchen door never so little and peeping on into the dining-room.

"Oh, is that you, Jonas?" said Martha, joyously. "I reckoned ye'd be late, but I'm glad you've come, fer the supper's jest at its best. An' a mighty good supper it is, Jonas; fried chicken an' mashed pertaters, an' that puddin' ye liked so well the other day.
Who's in the parlor, did ye say? Why, no one, es I knows on!" And she laughed again with a joyous abandon most wonderful of all.

"I lowed they wus company o' some sort," said Jonas slowly, still looking suspiciously about, "with the dinin'- room table set, an' you trigged out like a Sunday mornin'!"

Martha blushed a rosy red and swept back the straying curl with a quick, excited gesture. "I don't know who's got a better right to see me fixed up than you have, Jonas," she said, shyly.

How Jonas did brighten and straighten up his stooping shoulders at that, to be sure! "Why that's so, Marthy," he said, looking her over from top to toe.
"That's so, honey, ain't it?" And he looked her over again, as if the sight rested him, from the creamy rose in her auburn hair to the Sunday slipper that peeped from beneath her white gown.
"That's so, honey, ain't it?" he repeated, softly.

As they seated themselves at the dainty, well-filled table, an awkward shyness fell between them, almost like that they felt when they sat in that same little room on that first June evening many years ago. Jonas was lavish in his praises of the simple dishes, prepared with an artist's perfection, and Martha was full of questions about his day in town; but behind it all, there was an air of restraint, a sense of something more important left unsaid. At last, when the meal was ended, Jonas pushed back his chair and looked across at Martha, his face flushing with embarrassment.

"I hain't fergot what day this is,
Marthy," he said, "an' I'm that sorry about the carpet. I don't know how to tell it. Ye've arn't it time an' agin, an'
I'd been that proud to fetch it fer ye."

"Don't say another word, Jonas Pemberton," said Martha, eagerly. "I acted mean an' ugly about the carpet, an' no mistake. An' you a-slavin' an'
a-doin' the best ye could year in an'
year out! I don't deserve it now ef ye had the money right in yer hand! An' besides, I think jest es I allus did that it ain't the house, but you an' me a-livin' in it, that makes a home, Jonas!"

She was flushing, now, to the roots of her hair; but as Jonas rose and came toward her with something shining in his eyes that reminded her of other days, she turned shyly away toward the half open door.

"Let's go out an' look at the roses, Jonas," she said. "Ye ain't no idee how peart they look, a-shimmerin' and a-shinin' in the moonlight!"

World Ideals and How Foreign Missions Will Promote Them

Christian Endeavor, Dec. 8, 1915

THESE are rather dark and discouraging days to talk about world ideals. It is a particularly discouraging time to talk about the power of Christianity to lead the world to the highest ideals. For just now the greatest of the Christian nations seem bent upon turning the world into a slaughter-house instead of into a paradise.

The fact needs to be emphasized again and again that although the warring nations are called Christian, yet the war came, not because they were Christians, but because they were false to the principles of the faith they profess.

The Christian Church must dig down deeper into the message of Christ—must catch its real meaning, must see its vision—the vision of a world brotherhood, a brotherhood created and perpetuated under the smile of God. It must learn how the principles of kindness and service are to be applied by nation to nation as well as by man to man.

And the missionary must put a still greater emphasis upon national fraternity, acknowledging frankly that Christian Europe has failed to follow Jesus, and asking the help of the new converts of other lands to found a new Christendom which shall really lead the world forward toward God's ideals instead of hurling it back. The article on missions appearing in last week's issue of the Christian Herald shows how the work of the missionary is progressing in spite of the active hindrances of the war and the strange wonder created in heathen minds by the spectacle of Christians fighting.

Another thing may well be mentioned. Christian leaders and teachers are apt to speak of the connection of missions and commerce as though it were a good thing. They tell how the missionary opens up a new country for foreign trade. We ought to go very light on such talk. That is a dangerous connection; not one to be proud of.
The native has often had far too much reason to think that the Christian nations are interested chiefly in getting his money, in involving him in their wars. The missionaries have one message—the message of Jesus. It is the message of salvation, of world brotherhood, of world co-operation, not of world competition. They will help bring to pass Christ's dream for the world as they are true to this message.

Mother Learns a Lesson

Mother Brown—
visiting son and his new wife—after getting up at five o'clock on washday morning to help with the washing, is surprised and displeased to find no one stirring.

Her annoyance increases when breakfast is not hurried through, so the washing can be started.
Mother Brown is used to bustle, hustle and confusion on washday.

But Mother Brown is still more surprised as the day progresses.
Daughter-in-law declares she needs no help and expects to be through the wash not later than noon. While talking, she puts the clothes to soak with Fels-Naptha Soap.

Mother Brown
declares clothes can't be got clean and white without hard-rubbing and long boiling. But daughter-in-law assures her that clothes washed with Fels-Naptha
don't need hard-rubbing. Thirty minutes' soaking with Fels-Naptha gets the dirt loosened, dissolves grease and makes stains disappear with a few easy rubs.

True enough—the wash is all hanging on the line before noon, and Mother Brown and daughter-in-law sit down to a cozy, dainty lunch. Mother Brown admits she's convinced that clothes can be got clean without all-day drudgery over tubs and wash-boiler.

In the afternoon she helps daughter-in-law sprinkle down the clothes, and then insists on ironing a few pieces while daughter-in-law tells her the advantages of using Fels-Naptha Soap for all kinds of housework. It quickly, easily and thoroughly does all soap-and-water tasks.

In the Lead for More Than 20 Years G & J "Indianapolis Brand" "Chain Tread" Bicycle Tires

WHEN any product dominates its field continuously from the date of its invention, there can be no question about its merit. Pneumatic tires for bicycles came into use more than 20 years ago.

From then until now, the G & J "Indianapolis Brand" Bicycle Tire has been acknowledged by bicycle experts to be the leading tire for mileage, and the leading tire for puncture-resisting strength.

Today the G & J "Indianapolis Brand" Bicycle Tire is made with the famous "Chain Tread." This is the favorite anti-skid tread for automobile tires, for motorcycle tires and for bicycle tires. It not only practically prevents skidding, but also adds many miles to the life of the tire.

Be sure that any bicycle tire you buy has the G & J trade-mark, and the famous "Chain Tread."

hear from the people; and the hearts of people are more in evidence third-class than first.

It happened that at one station I settled myself comfortably in a compartment beside a window, the only passenger. Just before the train was to pull out for a four-hours' run, soldiers swarmed up and packed all the remaining seats of the train. Very politely one asked me if I objected to their presence in my compartment. I must confess to a moment's desire to escape, for the ante-war French soldiers had rather a merry reputation: I decided to stay.

"Are you boche, mademoiselle?" I was almost immediately asked, and I had already become familiar with the little word applied to France's enemy.

"No," I answered. "I am American—and madame."

They all pricked their ears. So I was American? American soldiers were fighting for France. Some of these soldiers had seen them and admired them. One of them told me that he had had the "honor to serve beside an American ambulance driver." There was no laughter, I think, even for a moment during those hours. These were not France's play-soldiers; these were real soldiers, with a grim, necessary duty to perform, not a joyous. They showed me all their family photographs and postcards, they told me their home stories—and they were rather homesick men—and then they solemnly said that one often lost one's appetite for meat, because it was flesh, and the killing of human flesh was their business! I tell this much less gruesomely than they did.

"Another winter campaign will be almost unendurable for both sides; we must endure it."

I gave the soldiers in my section the cherries I had brought with me, and they insisted that I eat some of the chocolate; they were hungry, and they assumed that I must be. It was impossible for me to refuse when they offered me diluted wine of the country from their canteen and tore off the corner of a loaf of bread from out of their knapsack. I have often wondered how many of the soldiers are still fighting!

If you have been in France, France was sunshine, you would not recognize it; if you have coupled the word frivolity with France, you must uncouple it. The sunshine is on the literal sunshine from heaven; and for frivolity, I was, after about ten days in France, startled by the sound of a girl's laughter, it does not seem right to laugh! I got to feel that I was almost doing a wrong to look, just as one might an unkindness to stare at the scar from a great burn on a human being's face. And those women and children—there is nothing for them but nursing and waiting, nothing but hiding the tears and hiding the fears, and working from dawn through the gray twilight to the after midnight at the tasks of men: nursing and waiting.

NOT infrequently investors find themselves possessed of funds which they desire to place in some sound but temporary 6 per cent. investment, preferably bonds, the principal of which will be repaid in a year or less, but it is not always easy to find such opportunities. The demand usually exceeds the supply. Just now Peabody, Houghteling & Co., 10 South La Salle Street, Chicago, Ill., are offering such bonds in $100 and $1,000 pieces. They are described in Circular 852 C, which will be sent free to any reader requesting it.

In war and in peace approved farm mortgages never fluctuate in value. This absolute fixedness of value—the inherent soundness of them—is why so many thousands of ultra-conservative investors buy mortgages on western farms. Write to E. J. Lander & Co., Grand Forks, N. D., for Booklet "O," describing this form of panic-proof security.

Through severest business depressions public service corporations have gone steadily ahead reporting increased earnings and enlarged surpluses. Good public service bonds are deservedly popular with careful investors. Today these bonds may be bought at prices to yield from one-quarter of one per cent. to one per cent. higher income return than in normal times. Many such bonds are described in "List H" of current offerings by A. H. Bickmore & Co., 111 Broadway, New York City. Intending investors should send for it.

It is probable that good investment bonds and stocks, if bought now, at prices which afford unusual interest return, will show marked increase in quotable values before another year. Securities listed on the New York Stock Exchange are likely to show greatest advances. How such stocks and bonds may be bought and sold owned outright, through the operation of the Partial Payment Plan (payments of $5, $10, etc.), is told in Free Book E-7, "The Partial Payment," published by Sheldon, Morgan & Co., members of the New York Stock Exchange, 49 Broadway, New York City. Send for it.

Everybody who owns stocks or bonds tries in on any of the stock exchanges, or who may contemplate an investment in such securities, should own "The Investor's Pocket Manual," containing 270 pages of condensed current statistics, prices and high and low prices of stocks and bonds of railroad, industrial and mining companies, also grain, cotton, coffee and provisions. The book is published monthly at $3 per year. A copy of the September issue will be sent free to any inquiring Christian Herald reader sending his name to L. R. Latrobe & Co., 111 Broadway, New York City.

The Postal Life Insurance Company deals direct with the public through the mails without costly intervention of the agency system. This eliminates the middleman in life insurance business, reducing premium cost and placing insurance protection within the reach of many who hitherto have believed they could not afford to purchase the rates asked by companies employing agents. Now the Postal is enabled to offer protection to those who seek low cost insurance is told in a booklet entitled "Sound Insurance Protection at Low Cost," which will be sent free to any Christian Herald reader writing to Mr. W. R. Mue, President of Postal Life Insurance Company, Nassau Street, New York City.

THE DISCIPLES AT LOS ANGELES

THE Annual International Missionary Convention of the Disciples of Christ lately closed at Los Angeles, Cal. There were about five thousand delegates. In the opening address Dr. J. A. Francis welcomed these visitors, whose presence was due to the growing sense of Christian unity in the world. The various Mission Boards made reports of progress.

The convention was held three months in advance of the usual time. The Christian Woman's Board of Missions, up to the time of the convention, had raised $258,000 toward their annual budget. They are planning to raise $142,000 in the next three months.

The "Men and Millions" Commission made a report that was replete with encouragement. Mr. R. A. Long of Kansas City started this movement to raise $6,300,000 for missions and education with a gift of one million dollars. Campaigns have been conducted in three states—Texas, Kentucky and Illinois—with the result that now the subscriptions total $2,700,000. At Los Angeles one man at the close of one of the sessions placed in the hands of the mission boards $10,000 in cash. The "Men and Millions" Commission reported that 22 men in the last year had definitely decided to devote their lives to missionary service. Thirty-seven volunteers were received in the collection.

The reports showed 200,000 boys and girls in training in the Disciple Houses. If one in ten elects to devote life to the Lord's work it is hoped that there will be 1,000 eligible for the mission field and another 1,000 for home pulpits.

The Board of Ministerial Relief showed that in the last three years its annual income has grown from $17,000 to $40,000, and the maximum permitted to aged ministers from $30 a quarter to $30 a month.

The next convention goes to St. Moines in October, 1916. Dr. W. F. Richardson of Kansas City was elected to preside over its deliberations. All the secretaries of the several missionary boards were re-elected for the ensuing year and an emergency call issued to the churches for a week of self-denial and sacrificial giving for the week beginning September 12 on behalf of the depleted missionary treasuries.

FOLKS are often surprised to find themselves in secret sympathy with the prep-school daughter of the house—with all her enthusiasms and exaggerations.

She “adores crispy things and crackly things;” and she simply “loathes mushes and porridge.”

Bless her heart, she’s one of the most devoted friends of Kellogg’s Toasted Corn Flakes. And she knows how to eat them—with good top-milk poured in at the side of the dish, not to soak the flakes, but to accompany them—and little if any sugar.

Maybe some one you know would like these filmy, golden flakes—most delicate of all the cereals—with their crispness between the teeth and their ever-alluring fresh-from-the-oven taste.

Remember, please, that you don’t know corn flakes unless you know Kellogg’s—the original Toasted Corn Flakes—their goodness insured by our responsibility to over a million homes.

Then too there is the WAXTITE package that keeps the fresh, good flavor in—and all other flavors out.

The "Wonder Car"

A Stampede to the 1916 Maxwell

Today, the 1916 models of every important make of automobile have been viewed by the most critical jury in the world—the American automobilists.

Already the record-breaking sales of the 1916 Maxwell show an absolute buying stampede to the "Wonder Car."

The "wise ones" who have given the 1916 Maxwell the verdict, base their judgment of real automobile value upon these four vital points:

- 1st—The "first cost" of the car
- 2nd—The "after cost" of the car
- 3rd—The quality of the materials and workmanship in the car
- 4th—The equipment and the "completeness" of the car

The 1916 Maxwell's new price, $655, fully equipped, with electric starter, electric lights, high-tension magneto, demountable rims, "one-man" mohair top, and every other high-priced-car feature, has earned it first place as the car of record low "First Cost."

The 1916 Maxwell's lowering of all economy records for—

- 1st—Miles per set of tires
- 2nd—Miles per gallon of gasoline
- 3rd—Miles per quart of lubricating oil
- 4th—Lowest year-in-and-year-out repair bills has earned it first place as The Car of Lowest "After Cost."

The 1916 Maxwell's pure stream-line body, new rounded clean-cut radiator design, and handsome "one-man" top, have earned for it first place as "the prettiest thing on four wheels."

The 1916 Maxwell's special heat-treated, laboratory-tested steel, built into a Twentieth Century Automobile by men who really know how,—has earned for it first place as the car of record low repair bills. And this record will extend over the entire life of the 1916 Maxwell.

A View in Syria. "Afterwards I came into Syria and Cilicia." Paul, Gal. 1:21

Cesarea, St. Paul's Prison City

By REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

AFTER St. Paul left Tyre in the ship that had borne him from Asia Minor, it was a day's sail of less than thirty miles down the coast to the next stopping place, Ptolemais, as it was then called, or Acre as it is now known. All that the scripture tells us of his sojourn in Ptolemais is: "We saluted the brethren, and abode with them one day. Short, however, as was his stay, every spot on which the apostle and his companions set foot in this memorable last journey of the first great missionary is sacred to the Christian's heart."

In his wanderings Paul could have seen few more beautiful, or, historically, more interesting cities than this city of Ptolemais. Even to-day, though it has lost most of its former importance, and has shrunk to a fraction of its former size, Acre is one of the most interesting cities that I have visited in the Near East.

Its situation is superb. On this dangerous coast of Syria with its few harbors, Acre lies on the inner circle of a beautiful bay, which, even without a breakwater affords good anchorage for vessels except in severe storms. A splendid hard, sandy beach, over which long caravans of camels are constantly journeying back and forth, piled high with the merchandise of the interior, connects it with the long, bold headland of Mount Carmel, which dominates all this section of the country, and can be seen far away as Nazareth to the east.

As Paul looked upon this most striking feature of the Syrian landscape must have thought of Elijah, who on this mountain top confounded the prophets of Baal, and of the many other Old Testament scenes which cent in this vicinity. But doubtless most of his time and thought were given to the few disciples of his Master Jesus who made Ptolemais their home.

Let us follow St. Paul within the walls of the city, and see what we may find here to-day. The walls are still high and massive, though battered and shaded here and there by the bombardment of the English fleet under Sir Sidney Smith in 1840. As we enter the lofty gateway we soon come to the bazaar, or market-place, where are numerous little stalls or tables covered with sugar-cane, dates, tomatoes, peppers, olives and oranges. On low stools not more than a foot high, turbaned Turks are sitting with their legs crossed, sipping cups of thick black coffee.

Just beyond the market-place is a great mosque, in front of which is a truly beautiful fountain. We keep up the narrow, unclean street until we come out upon the ramparts, built high above the sea. Here, scattered about in confusion, rusty, useless cannon, while we see in the battered and broken walls the great rents made by the shells of Napoleon more than a hundred years ago, and by the British near half a century later. The walls themselves do not date from St. Paul's time, but from the days of the Crusaders, though they have doubtless been built up and strengthened many times since.

The old cannon and these bomb-rent walls remind us of the wonderful checkered and romantic history of Acre. To tell it in detail would require a volume.

Here the Egyptians before the time of Joseph besieged the city; Sennacherib too, and Esar-haddon, the Assyrian generals of whom the Bible tells us, also brought their armies against the city. Here came Cleopatra to be its queen, and Titus and Vespasian, and Baldwin the First, the great Crusader, and Richard Cœur de Lion, all were in turn its conquerors.

COMING down almost to our own day, we can imagine as we look off to sea that Napoleon's transports and great three-deckers are coming to capture the city; and we remember that, with all his genius, though he besieged it for sixty days, Bonaparte was unable to force its garrison to surrender, and had to retire from it baffled and defeated, so strong were the walls even in the last year of the eighteenth century. But what Napoleon could not do, the allied armies of England and Austria accomplished a few years later; and they have left sad traces of the last siege of Acre.

As we go farther around the walls, and come to the landward side, we see a green oasis in the midst of the great fertile plain of Acre. Here are splendid trees

Paul spent only a day in Ptolemais and hurried on to Cesarea, and so must we. It was but little more than thirty miles, and the journey was doubtless made in a single day. In Cesarea he found a congenial spirit indeed, no less a personage than Philip the Evangelist. When last we saw Philip, in one of the earlier chapters of Acts, he was journeying southward from Jerusalem to Gaza. Here he met the Ethiopian eunuch, "of great authority under Candace, queen of the Ethiopians." We saw him preaching to the eunuch and baptizing him, and afterwards learned that he "preached the gospel to all the cities till he came to Cesarea."

This was before the day of Saul's conversion, while he was yet "breathing threatening and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord." How glad these two brethren must have been to meet each other! What a warm welcome did the apostle receive, after his twenty years of missionary labor, from Philip and his four virgin daughters!

What sort of a city was it to which Paul had now come, and in which he was destined to linger through twenty-four months of wearisome imprisonment a little later?

It is almost impossible to imagine that glorious Cesarea ever existed here and flowering shrubs of all kinds, and in their midst a fine old mansion which might almost be dignified by the name of palace. Here it is that for so many years the Sheik Abbas, or Abdu'l Baha, the head of the Bahais, was imprisoned by Abdul Hamid II. His recent visit to America after his release by the Young Turks will be remembered by many of my readers, for he made a great sensation by his "devotional mysticism" and his plea for universal brotherhood.

He was evidently a devout old man with humanitarian ideas, and his doctrines were a vast improvement over those of the Sultan who imprisoned him, but so far as I could learn there was nothing in them which had not been taught in a purer form by Jesus Christ, while there was also mixed with them much Persian and Zoroastrian lore which a Christian could not accept.

However, I enjoyed meeting the patriarchal old man, and when I told him that I had just seen the prison of his old enemy, Sultan Abdul Hamid II, in Salonica, he replied, "Yes, the Lord took the chains off my neck and put them around his."

CESAREA was by no means such a city as Tyre or Ptolemais, with a great and glorious history; but, so to speak, a ready-made city, built by Herod the Great in less than twelve years. Herod seems to have had a genius for city-building, and this one, established on the rugged and harborless shore of Palestine, he named in honor of his Emperor, Augustus Caesar. Nevertheless, though it was a new town, and might well have been named Neapolis (or Naples) in contrast with its hoary neighbors, it was by no means lacking, during its brief existence, in sumptuous grandeur. "The city," we are told, "was provided with everything that could contribute to magnificence, amusement, and health; but its great boast was its harbor, which provided for the ships which visited that dangerous coast a safe basin equal in extent to the Piræus. Vast stones were sunk in the sea to the depth of twenty fathoms, and thus a stupendous breakwater was formed, curving around so as to afford complete protection from the southwesterly winds, and open only on the north."

The buildings of this beautiful city were of white stone. A great theater and amphitheater were found within its precincts. In this theater occurred the tragic death of King Herod. We remember how the revolting people from Tyre and Sidon had come to make peace with Herod. How he sat arrayed in royal apparel on his throne in the theater, while the people shouted, saying, "It is the voice of a god and not of a man!" "And immediately an angel of the Lord smote him because he gave not God the glory, and he was eaten of worms and gave up the ghost."

But there were other buildings besides the palaces and theater. The procurators, Felix and Festus, under whom Paul suffered imprisonment, doubtless had a great palace here; a splendid temple dedicated to "Caesar and Rome" loomed on the view as one approached the city from the sea. Here also were large synagogues of the Jews, who were so numerous that when the final conflict broke out which overthrew Jerusalem and forever broke the last remnants of Jewish power, no less than 20,000 Hebrews were slain in the streets of Cesarea.

SUCH is the story of the magnificent capital, with its sudden rise to splendor and power. For a little while it overshadowed Jerusalem in importance, but it soon lost its prestige, and its decay has been complete and irreparable. As one stands upon the lonely surf-washed shore it is almost impossible to imagine that a glorious city ever existed here. The best of its marbles have been carried off to other cities, or buried deep under the drifting sands. The harbor, which was its boast, is now undiscernible, though some blocks of granite belonging to the ancient mole can still be seen far under water. The site of the temple of Caesar is marked only by a few foundation stones.

Near the southern extremity of the ruins of the old Roman city some remains are found of what is probably, according to the antiquarians, the theater in which Herod "gave up the ghost." Not far away can be seen the undoubted site of the great hippodrome, or amphitheater, which Herod built to accommodate 20,000 spectators. Standing upon its ruins in the midst of this utter desolation, it is difficult indeed to picture the magnificent populous city or the mighty stadium with its score of thousands of excited spectators cheering the games, or perhaps the dying struggles of the gladiators.

Few places are more absolutely cities of the past than Cesarea. Some one has spoken of the remains of its ancient glory as the "ruin of ruins." The medieval town which was twice rebuilt by the Crusaders covered scarcely a tenth of the area occupied by the city as St. Paul knew it, and the ruins that we see to-day are chiefly the relics of the medieval city, which was itself built out of the ruins of the ancient city.

What a rich quarry Cesarea has been for other city-builders is shown by the fact that, though it has been drawn upon for all these centuries for marble and granite and sandstone, it is not yet absolutely exhausted, but still affords building material for the peasants of the vicinity.

The green crystal vase which was found here when Baldwin I, the great Crusader, captured the city at the beginning of the twelfth century gave rise to the story of the Holy Grail, which has inspired so many legends and poems, for Baldwin and his followers believed that it was the one that was used at the Last Supper by our Lord, when he gave his disciples the cup of wine, and said, "Drink ye all of it; this do in remembrance of me."

No one has given us a more beautiful version of the story of the Holy Grail than James Russell Lowell, as he describes the search of the haughty young nobleman through many lands for the precious cup. At last after a lifetime of wandering—

A poor old man worn out and frail, He comes back from seeking the Holy Grail.

He finds a loathsome leper by the brink of the spring, and sharing with him his crust of coarse brown bread, and water out of his wooden bowl, he finds that the poor wooden bowl from which he had given the leper drink is itself the true Holy Grail, and the voice of the Christ speaks to him through the leper, saying,

The Holy Supper is kept indeed, In whatso we share with another's need. Who gives himself with his gifts feeds three;

Himself, his hungering neighbor, and Me.

THE ruins of Cesarea are more inaccessible to-day than the site of any other great city connected with St. Paul's journeys. Only in dry weather is it possible to reach them at all, and not one traveler in Palestine in a hundred ever sees them.

I need not linger long on the story of St. Paul's imprisonment for two weary years in Cesarea. It is told more at length than almost any other New Testament story in the six chapters from the twenty-first to the twenty-sixth chapter of Acts, and it is so graphically and in such detail that to try to paraphrase it would only injure its effect.

We remember his brief visit to Jerusalem after landing at Cesarea, his accusation by the Pharisees of having desecrated their temple, his sudden flight back to Cesarea guarded by Roman cavalry and infantry, his months of imprisonment under the wily, unscrupulous Felix, and afterward under the just and reasonable Festus. During all these four or twenty months he was probably confined to a Roman guard, though he was treated with as much consideration as was possible for a prisoner in those days, and his friends were allowed to visit him freely.

But during these months he was not idle. He had a chance to preach the Gospel to men of low and high degree, to soldiers from many parts of the world, for the Romans drew their troops from all lands, and he had the opportunity of making at least three great addresses to rulers of the highest rank: before Felix the procurator, then before Felix and his Jewish wife Drusilla, and before Festus the new procurator and King Agrippa himself. Two of these addresses are recorded at some length for our benefit and that of Christians in all the ages to come. Possibly he wrote, while in the Cesarean prison, two or three of his extant epistles, but it is not certain.

At length, when all other avenues of escape from his deadly enemies the Jews, were cut off, he appealed as a Roman citizen to the Emperor of Rome, and Festus replied, "Thou hast appealed unto Cæsar. Unto Cæsar shalt thou go." In another article we shall follow his adventurous journey toward Rome and martyrdom.

Konxila: The Path-Openers

By D. W. C. SNYDER

SIX African natives stood before the altar who less than two years before that time were heathens of the heathen, whose only songs were obscene, whose ways were the ways of the cannibal, whose ideas were the ideas of the perniciously wicked. But this day, after years of labor and trials, amid many disappointments and discouragements, the missionaries saw them clothed and in their right minds, their feet set on the rock Christ Jesus, and from their lips new songs issuing; for they sang from the Moody and Sankey song books the hymns which the missionaries had translated for them into their own language.

From that little bright spot twenty-two years ago an ever widening spot of glory has grown larger and larger. At that time the language was not reduced to writing, and the missionaries labored with an "A B C" card and a few lessons written out on a typewriter. But to-day, as I write, there lies before me, on my desk, a book. It is not a novel, although it is a novel book; it is not a love story, though it is a story of love, deep and devout. It is an ordinary looking book, bound in cloth, with red edges, making one think of a hymn book, but inside there are no songs, no music, and yet there breathes a poem of thanksgiving and joy, a song of triumph and rejoicing. Those only who have worked under the sun of Africa can appreciate the tremendous amount of painstaking labor there is bound up in this "Baluba-Laluba Grammar and Dictionary," by Dr. W. M. Morrison.

As I turn the pages what vivid scenes arise! What wonderful pictures come and go! The first, very naturally, is of Luebo and its people as I first saw them, crude, unlearned, naked, without God and without hope; the chattering monkeys in the treetops, and the clamorous natives beneath the trees; and seemingly very little choice between them. Finally the people are chosen and work begun among the Bakete. Crude, unsatisfactory work at first, but still a work, a few grammatical notes and rules, a rough clay schoolhouse, the A B C card, and a few naked children!

NONE but those interested will ever know of the hardships of those first years. The scene changes, and a brave, earnest, dogged spirit is added to the personnel of the mission. Come with me for a few moments down to the northwest corner of the compound. We enter a most ungainly looking clay hut with a most hideous looking grass roof; a clay floor, rough walls, no ceiling, nothing to inspire thought. A rickety table stands on the uneven floor. Above the table are rows and rows of brass hooks on which are pieces of paper scribbled all over, erasures, interlinings; grist from the mill below. At the table sits a man clad in an overcoat (although the temperature is above 60 degrees), a slouch hat drawn well over the intellectual brow, a pair of faded blue overalls, and a pair of canvas shoes with the soles worn out—Dr. Morrison thinking and writing his grammar. Brave, determined Dr. Morrison, who for four years, day after day, patiently and conscientiously dug and probed for gold in the dark mine of ignorance and superstition! Those years, if written out in detail, would give us a most wonderful tale of perseverance and grit; fevers, aches, pains, hunger, disappointments, trials, vexations, failures, homesickness, weariness, heartaches in greater measure than could possibly come to a man working never so adversely in the home country.

But it was worth it. Twenty years later Bishop W. R. Lambuth writes: "Dr. Morrison has done a great work in translating the Bible. He has not only translated it, but has put into this work a kind of interpretation such as is given by a paraphrase, and it has been admirably done, and is a great monument to his zeal and judgment." Following the native custom of giving names to newcomers they gave him the name Konxila, "the path-opener." Their name for book, chart, is muluda. Not only did he open a path for them, but he left them a chart.

Twenty-eight years ago pagan darkness, dense forests, no schools; day Christian light, a clearing in the woods a church, a school, a printing-press and thousands of Christians. Twenty-eight years ago two lone missionaries, today thirty-seven on the field and eleven on the way. Twenty-eight years ago no church, today six. Twenty-eight years ago not a Christian, today ten thousand!

A VERY interesting and impressive service occurred Sunday, July 1, at the old "Church of the Huguenots," now the Huguenot Reformed Church, at Huguenot Park, S. L., when a farewell service was held for eleven young missionaries who were on their way to Africa under the care of the Southern Presbyterian Mission Board of Nashville, Tenn. Interesting because of the good old Huguenot blood which has left its imprint on this neighborhood and church, and as the missionaries stood before the pulpit it was as if the spirits of the Huguenots were present to do honor to their bravery and bid them godspeed on their mission, carrying the same Gospel for which they had fought and suffered so many years ago, to a far-off people who need the Gospel of liberty and salvation. Interesting, too, because the pastor, D. W. C. Snyder, was for many years a missionary in the very same field.

Weighing and buying in rubber. A study in contrast travely and rejoicingly carrying out the command of our Saviour, "Go ye therefore, and teach all nations." It truly touched the heart of the pastor, he could not but think, "What hath wrought?" Twenty-two years ago this month the first natives were baptized into the Christian Church! The Rev. W. M. Sheppard and the pastor were the ones who baptized the first converts, and that Sunday morning was the happiest one the writer ever spent.

TWENTY-TWO years ago last month the first Christians were born into the world at Luebo, Africa. Among them were Mudimbe, Madi, Kondola, Malala and Baxong. Now listen: twenty-two years after that great event, Bishop W. Lambuth of the Southern Methodist Church went to Africa, Kongo Belge, to start a mission. He went to Luebo to study Dr. Morrison's ways and also to do as to the best locality. Let me quote from his letter:

When I got to Luebo and knew not where to go, Dr. Morrison suggested to us the Battala. . . . When we asked him where we were to go to our new field, he said we would require about sixty men to carry our luggage; he raised forty for the neighborhood and said, 'I will call for volunteers from the Luebo church.' All the people were called to hear and the matter explained. . . . The dangers from fever, leopards, sleeping sickness, and cannibals were explained to them; twenty offered, and then one man got up and offered himself: this man was Mudimbe, the leading chief of the mission, and head of three hundred teachers and evangelists. When asked if he knew the difficulties and dangers he said he did; his only hesitation was about the crops; it was the planting season. The church offered to help after the crops and families of the natives while they helped carry the Gospel to heathen. . . . This first man who offered his services was, as stated, a rugged elder in the mission. He was a son of an African chief. When a child a neighboring tribe at war with his father made a raid on the village and killed his father and mother. He was taken prisoner and at first treated well, but later ill used, and he ran away and was captured by the Nzapo tribe and fattened to be eaten. Before being killed he escaped and was again captured, but this time by the Belgian soldiers, who took him to Luluaburg. Dr. Snyder of the Presbyterian Mission stopped there on his way through the interior on a preaching tour. He was asked if they did not want a few boys for their school at Luebo. He took ten, among them this boy Mudimbe, who afterward was converted (one of the very first).

We still quote from the Bishop's letter: "He became an active, consistent member of the church and was made an elder. This man developed into the leading native worker of the entire mission."

So many have asked me, "But what kind of Christians do they make?" Let the above be my answer.

And let me also speak of Mputa David.

A White Trader, His Pet Monkey and Corps of Native Servants

Away in the heart of Darkest Africa is the village of Ngeya Kalabamba. In this village a very remarkable work has been done by the native evangelist Mputa David. This village is one of the farthest outposts of the mission at Luebo, Kongo Belge, being almost entirely cut off from the missionaries and the benefits to be gotten from their occasional visits. Mputa David therefore had only his Bible and prayer to depend on.

A short while ago there was held at Luebo the annual Evangelistic Conference for all the teachers and evangelists attached to the Luebo Station. Among the number came Mputa David. Many subjects were discussed, many suggestions made. In the course of a brief talk given by Mputa David, he stated that he did not permit any one to enter the catechumen class until that one had a "bisokomenu," i. e., a hiding place for prayer. Here lay the secret of his wonderful success. Later on, asked what he meant by these places, he told Dr. Morrison that sometimes the people made them by clearing off a little spot in the forest where were placed a table and a chair. Sometimes these places were enclosed in a corner of the veranda. Mputa David also made visits now and then to these places for prayer.

Here was an uncultured native, who a few years before was a heathen of the heathens. One of the first converts, he tested out in Darkest Africa the injunction given in Matt. 6:6, and in his village of Ngeya Kalabamba, the chief, contrary to what is usually the case, is a strong, earnest Christian; the village is clean, physically and morally. In that village is a school and more than one catechumen class, and from this village have been trained and sent out to neighboring villages more than twenty native teachers. The Lord's Day is better observed here than it is in any town of its size in Christian America. "What sort of Christians do they make?"

True Patriotism Opposed to War

By LUCIA AMES MEAD*

THE European war probably marks the most critical period in human history. Civilization has come to a parting of the ways and faces two alternatives. One is renewed reliance on force; conscription, extending gradually to America and the Orient; armed Asia facing an armed Europe; degrading democracy, repudiation of interable war debts and the decay of all that makes life worth living. The other alternative is initial steps through a League of Peace toward organization, an beginning of that co-operation which can alone preserve nations from even a worse catastrophe than that with this tragic year has wrought.

amid the maddening maze of things, in which many trained minds have lost the bearings, a few points stand out clearly to those who have not been led into the quagmire of sophistry that is primarily responsible for the great war. These permanent principles can be understood unless one perceives the causes of the European war.

Causes of the War

This war was due largely to false premises, confused thinking, wrong analogies and twisted logic. These, though the teaching of chauvinistic patriotism and crude economics from primary school through university, led in many lands to a philosophy that bred national arrogance, suspicion and fear. Fear clamored for armaments, blind to the fact that these bred rival armaments or that there was any other device of life or honor but explosives. The war was precipitated by men of twentieth-century education in technical combined with seventeenth-century conceptions of honor and international relations. It was largely the product of primary textbook writers, of Harmsworth newspapers, of learned Teutonic professors and materialistic philosophers. It was fomented by parliamentarians who pocketed dividends from the dreadnoughts that they ordered, by ministers of foreign affairs who had never met, by diplomats separated from the people by a great gulf of indifference and misunderstanding and by bishops and clergy who taught a double standard of ethics, one for the individual and one for the nations. It was a war brought on by ultimatums which, with a censored press, paralyzed the great financial and labor forces that would have prevented it had even a month's delay offered opportunity. For more than a generation subtle forces had been working in many lands which would bind hand and foot all protesters when the great exigency arose.

Sophistry

THE same subtle forces are working here and now, undermining American ideals with smug complacency, self-righteousness and certainty that we can never be militarized. Our Army and Navy League has glorified Prussian methods and held them up for imitation. Our most eminent general asserted two years ago that he would like to "out-German the Germans" in military training and teach every boy of twelve to shoot. These men are now in the saddle, urging that war is inevitable and night and day pushing their demands for enormous increase of armaments with the same argument that brought about Europe's "Preparedness" for the great calamity. At this critical moment, when the world's opinion is in flux and America can help shape it, the first public duty of the patriot is to think logically. This is more difficult than feeding starving Servians, but it may in the end save more lives.

Before long, ideas will crystallize and crude thought and prejudice are quite as likely as insight and reason to harden into an adamant mold. Our country is the blessed land of opportunity. It is the only one of the eight powers not in the agonizing grip of war. It can think. Its supreme business is to think and to help others to think. The patriot's first task is to learn to read the daily press so as to detect sophistry from sagacity and to perceive relative values; above all things to count nothing human foreign and to see the world through alien's eyes. The common fallacies which occur in myriad phraseologies, must be learned by heart, together with their refutation. Space forbids analysis of but a few.

Military Advisers

ONE dangerous error is that military men should be our chief advisers concerning national dangers and the most adequate forms of defense. Thirty years' study of war games and the qualities of projectiles teaches no one the psychologic processes of foreign cabinets and the influence that would most antagonize or win them. It may prove in the future that paying back Chinese indemnities, making friends with Cuba, repealing the exemption of Panama Canal tolls and employing mediation of "A B C" powers have helped defend us from more enemies than has all our fleet. The brave military man whose patriotism and skill are not questioned is admirable as a technician but not as a statesman. His constant insistence "that all government depends on force" ignores the fact that armies and navies themselves could not exist without agriculture, manufacture, commerce, money, railroads, which, with the tacit consent of the governed, with schools, the courts, the press and other necessities, form the broad basis on which government rests. Force is used by all nations, but it is used the least in the most stable government, and only in such governments as Turkey or Mexico is it a prominent factor in maintaining government.

War and Struggle

"WAR," in the words of General Wood, "is inevitable because life is an eternal struggle."

Struggle, to be sure, is the law of the universe, but it is tragic confusion of thought which confounds that brief, abnormal kind of struggle, called "war," with the wholesome, eternal struggle against conditions in which man gains life more abundantly. It is assumed that war exists in the animal world and is our natural inheritance. An American general has just said, "We are animals and every man who feels as a man should glories in being a buck in the outer ring when danger threatens his country. A young man who hasn't some fighting instinct is denatured and a mollycoddle. In the last analysis our civilization depends on the sword." Here is a mature, brave man who has not learned what ought to be taught to every schoolboy before he is old enough to do long division. This is that war is no more inevitable than are duels, no more natural than are murders. Two brutes, like two men, sometimes indeed engage in an impromptu duel, but they never fight in masses to destroy their own kind. When brutes kill, it is almost always other species and for food. The wolf who kills a lamb is no more engaged in war than the farmer who does the same thing for the same purpose—food. A pack of wolves never attacks another pack of wolves, but organized men through perversion of nature attack their own kind—their natural colleagues.

MAN follows scientifically the law of his own being when he, like Peary, contends against Arctic frosts, or like Livingstone against tropical fever, or like Jacob Riis, fights slums and civic corruption, or like many a rheumatic heroine at the washtub, who struggles for her children's bread and education. He sets at naught all science and the

The City of God and Men

A SERMON BY REV. G. CAMPBELL MORGAN, D.D.*

TEXT: "The holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down out of heaven from God." Rev. 21:2

THE passage from which the text is taken constitutes one of the most matchless pieces of symbolism in the divine library. It is a picture of the City of God, the metropolis of the new earth—the new earth which is to be created through those processes of upheaval and conflict which are so graphically set forth in this book of Revelation. The city here described has been the goal of the pilgrims of faith in all their conflict and building from Abraham until now; ay, and it was the goal of the pilgrims of faith before Abraham, and it will be the goal of the pilgrims of faith beyond today.

No man can exactly determine where the literal ends and the figurative begins in this great description. It does not signify in the least; for if we knew exactly what is literal we should have to bear in mind that the literal is symbolic; and if we knew what is figurative, we should have to remember that the figurative is in order to the interpretation of fact. The one thing that is certain is, that it is true. Of that we are reminded at its very commencement and at its very close. Twice over, He who spoke to John said, "These words are faithful and true."

As we dwell in the cities of men, seeking the city of God, we shall take up sword and trowel with new passion as the vision burns brightly before us, and that vision is perfectly portrayed in this passage. I only propose certain groupings of the facts in order to clearer seeing, and in order that when the calm of the Sabbath day is over, and we go back into the midst of the city with its sin and its sorrow and its sighing, some gleams of the radiant glory may flash around us, making us stronger for our battle and for our building.

"Eye Hath Not Seen . . ."

It is well that we should observe in the very first place that this is not a picture of heaven, but of a city which comes out of heaven. It is not a place to which men go in order that they may dwell with God; it is rather a place to which God comes in order that he may tabernacle with men. The whole glory and beauty of the picture lies in the fact that the city is a place of divine residence among the sons of men; "Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and he shall dwell with them, and they shall be his peoples, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God." As we read the story we are baffled again and again as to the mystery of it. Let us not forget that this city is to be built in a new earth, where the conditions will be other than those which we know to-day—an earth in which there shall be realized the first intention of God, the primal purpose of the Most High for humanity. It is thus a picture of the ultimate corporate realization of the life eternal, which was manifested when the Word tabernacled among men, and they "beheld his glory, glory as of the only begotten from the Father, full of grace and truth."

First, then, as to the origin of the city. All is of heaven and all is of earth. All is of heaven; the ideal is a heavenly ideal; the forces that realize the ideal are heavenly forces; the fact in its entirety is a heavenly fact established within the world. Yet again, as we read the mystic story, we discover that everything is of the earth. All the materials named are earthly materials; the dimensions employed are earthly dimensions; the surroundings in the city, only referred to in inclusive phrases, "the nations" of the world, and "the kings of the earth," are all of this world. The heaven and the earth merge and blend in perfect harmony of color and sound and energy. No conflict is there here, as between the heavenly and the earthly; no separation as between the things of this world and the things of the larger spiritual world; in this city there is no division between sacred and secular. That tremendous fact is emphasized by that supremely surprising declaration that in the city of God there is no temple. The whole city has become a place of worship; there is no specially separated place or occasion for worship, because all the activity of the city is the activity of worship. Thus we see that the city of God results from the cooperation of God and man, of heaven and earth; initiation on the part of God, and response on the part of man; and at last that city, the perpetual shining of which has been the inspiration of all heroic endeavor among the sons of faith, will be firmly established, and the world will no longer be distanced in any sense from heaven, but united to it, by inspiration and endeavor, in realization and glory and beauty.

"The City That Lieth Foursquare"

Let us look at the city as John presents it to us; first, at its general proportions; and secondly, at its matchless beauty.

Looking at this city and attempting to see its general proportions, I observe its elevation, its extent, its enveloping wall, and all the things that wall encloses. First, then, as to the elevation of the city. John says it "lieth foursquare . . . the length and the breadth and the height thereof are equal." In attempting to project the city in our imagination we have sometimes tried to build up a city that formed a perfect cube. I do not think that is the idea suggested. The elevation is rather pyramidal. The city appearing before the vision lieth foursquare on its broad base, but climbs tier on tier, terrace upon terrace, mountain height upon mountain height, to the central apex where is the throne.

Then we come to an amazing statement. John said the extent of the city was twelve thousand stadia; that is, roughly, fourteen hundred miles. Now immediately we are in the presence of a slight difficulty. By that statement, are we to understand that every side of the city measured fourteen hundred miles, or was that the measurement round? My own view is that each side was fourteen hundred miles. The other view would make each side three hundred and fifty miles. Supposing, for the sake of argument, that it does mean that each side measured fourteen hundred miles, what then? Get the best map of the world you can find, get your scale of mileage, and cut out a square of paper fourteen hundred miles every way, and try and put it down somewhere in the world. You will find that you cannot put it down on any continent except Asia. If you try to put it in North America, one rim of it will touch Hudson's Bay and another will touch the Gulf of Mexico, and part of it will overlap the sea. It would blot out the whole of Europe, and stretch over the seas in every direction. You can put it down in Asia, and nowhere else. Or if we accept the other measurement, then we have a city three hundred and fifty miles along every one of its frontages. Is this literal or figurative? Suppose it is literal. Then you say my argument breaks down about the fourteen hundred miles, for no continent will hold it except Asia. But you notice that John dried up the seas at the very beginning. When you have done that, there is room anywhere for the city. Be all that as it may, one thing is impressed upon the soul: the vastness of the city. London is a little village, lost in the presence of the glorious magnificence of the distances of the ultimate city of God.

The Glories of the City

Passing beyond the wall into the city, we catch gleams of its glory; but John has described it with practically no detail. Three things only he tells us about the inside of the city; the street is of pure gold as it were transparent glass; a river proceeds from the throne, passing through the streets; on each side of the river trees grow, bearing fruit, and having leaves that are for the health of the nations; healing is not necessary, for there will be no sickness there; but the maintenance of health is necessary, and the leaves of the tree are for the health of the nations. It is a city vast, enclosed, guarded; having streets of gold, with a crystal river, and growing trees; it is God's garden city.

Let us not tarnish the splendor by arguing as to whether this is literal or figurative. Let it be figurative, and then let us remember that all the gleaming glory of the city of God as John saw it can only be suggested to our mind by figures of speech that employ the most beautiful and precious things in this material world of ours to set out the ultimate grandeur of God's great city.

The whole city is under the direct immediate government of God. In the midst of the city is the throne of God and of the Lamb. Mark the conjunction: the throne of God and of the Lamb; it is the throne upon which sits the Creator, having sovereign right; the throne that is occupied by the Redeemer, having sovereign right. All the life of the city, proceeding through the endless day, without tears, or sighing, or sorrow, is under the direct and immediate government of God.

Then, in two or three sentences, it is revealed that the city is not all. Beyond it, outside it, stretching over the earth, are the nations of the world and the kings of the earth, and their occupation is carrying to the city their glory and honor. The kings of the earth, ruling in authority, are under the preme authority of the throne of God and of the Lamb.

I look again at the city and consider the suggestion of the walls and gates. Look at the men whose names are engraved on the foundations. Look at the men whose names are engraved on the gates. Then look at the living stones in which the names are engraved. Look at the glory of the gates, upon which the names are written. The men whose names are upon the foundations are the twelve apostles of the Lamb. The men whose names are upon the gates are the twelve sons of Jacob.

In Matthew's grouping of the twelve apostles we have the order of their sending out. If we connect that with the order of the precious stones, probably we find where each name rested. At least, he is a suggestion for the poetic mind and heart. Probably the stones reveal the peculiar glory and character of those ransomed men. It is at least interesting to notice that the last stone on the breast-plate of the high priest on which was engraved the name Epaphroditus becomes the first in the foundations of the city, on which in all probability was engraved the name of Peter. I am not careful about the detail. The fact is that the names of faulty, shifting, failing men are cut deep into the living stones. Every jewel is a perfect exemplification of passion held in check by principle, of principle suffused with passion. Look at the gem that flashes upon your finger. If it is a diamond, it is carbon, commonest in some senses of the things of this material world, transmuted by processes so marvelous that no man has ever yet been able to make a diamond—though ever and anon there have been those who have claimed to be able to do so—transmuted by the alchemy of nature, the chemistry of God; it is passion held in check by principle, principle suffused with passion. The names of all those men are engraved upon such living stones. Regenerate humanity is the foundation of the city of God.

Having passed the portals and being within the walls, I wander in the magnificent distances, and observe the things of the city. There are no tears, there is no death. Death never ought to have been in this world of ours; death has no proper place in ideal, essential humanity. The wages of sin, that is death. In that last city of God, when redemption has wrought its perfect victory, there will be no death. There will be no mourning, no crying, no pain; the first things are passed away. The fearful and unbelieving, together with the abominable, murderers, liars, excluded from the city. There is no curse in the city, and no night.

Those That Dwell Therein

Who, then, are those that dwell in that city? "They which are written in the Lamb's book of life" that is the Burgess roll. The gates swing open to the North, the regions of the earth where dwell those of reason, of logic; to the South, to the lands in which the men of emotion dwell, with their warm and soul-satisfying affections; to the East, the regions of mystery and meditation; to the West, the lands of progress and advancement. From all the points of the compass they come into the city of God.

From a contemplation necessarily so imperfect we turn again to the city in which we live. How different it is! Most of all is my heart smitten with its sin and its shame and its sorrows. For all the things excluded from the last city of God I find within this city. Then look again, and think of its aspirations. East and West, in mansion and in tenement house, human hearts are crying out for the higher and the nobler. Look again and think of its spiritual beauty; the graces and glories of character flash and shine here and there in conditions of poverty and grim and ugliness; hearts are tremulous with the tenderness of Deity, kind with the compassions of God. Look again, and if sin and oppression are in the city, note the holiness that is there, men and women standing erect in the presence of dire temptations, men and women daring to do the right and suffering loss through the running years and cycling hours. Are you appalled by its sorrows? Look again and note the laughter which is not the laughter of hollowness and emptiness, but of a holy joy. These are the spiritual things in the midst of the things of darkness, of which God's city is to be built.

Now we go back to our work. If we have seen anything of the glory we shall do it better. To live by faith is to help to build.

The Arabic Making Her Death Plunge

It is not to be gainsaid that the sinking of the passenger steamer Arabic by a German submarine without warning held serious menace to the continued friendly relations between Germany and the United States. A certain section of the American press was quick to prepare the public mind for the most drastic consequences. The war party in the United States could scarcely wait for the conclusion of the investigation which the German Government had promised to make. It looked indeed as if the reason so ardently desired by the militarists of the United States for a call to arms had materialized. Every devout lover of peace and honor, therefore, received with thankful relief the word that the German Government had adopted a course very nearly in line with the former demands of the American Government. Irrespective of all differences of opinion as to the issues which have arisen between the two governments, the whole country (with possibly the exception of the out-and-out militarists) rejoiced with the Administration at the diplomatic victory achieved. That it is a diplomatic victory of the highest order is admitted on all sides. That it is a complete victory is not yet so certain, but at the present writing there seems little reason to doubt that Germany will for the future conduct her submarine warfare in harmony with the principles laid down in the various notes of the American Government on the subject.

The strongest ground for this expectation lies in the formal note delivered by the German ambassador, Count von Bernstorff, to Secretary of State Robert Lansing, on September first and reading as follows:

"MY Dear Mr. Secretary: With reference to our conversation of this morning I beg to inform you that my instructions concerning our answer to your last Lusitania note contain the following passage:

"Liners will not be sunk by our submarines without warning and without safety of the lives of noncombatants, provided that the liners do not try to escape or offer resistance. Although I know that you do not wish to discuss the Lusitania question till the Arabic incident has been definitely and satisfactorily settled, I desire to inform you of the above because this policy of my government was decided on before the Arabic incident occurred. I have no objection to your making any use you may please of the above information.

"I remain, my dear Mr. Lansing, very sincerely yours, J. Bernstorff."

Of this note Secretary Lansing said: "In view of the clearness of the foregoing statement, it seems needless to make any comment in regard to it, other than to say that it appears to be a recognition of the fundamental principle for which we have contended."

On top of this important admission comes the news from Berlin that it is currently believed in official circles that Count von Bernstorff has been empowered to complete the negotiations with the American Government on this grave subject. Taken all together, it may be said that the regrettable sinking of the Arabic on August 19 may yet prove to be a turning point in the war toward peace.

A truly remarkable coincidence lent accidental aid to a friendly settlement of the Arabic incident itself, namely, the sinking by a British patrol vessel of the U-boat that torpedoed the Arabic. It is claimed that the destruction of the submarine also destroyed the evidence upon which the German Government expected to show that her commander acted contrary to orders or without orders, one or the other. A complete disavowal by Germany of unfriendly intent in the sinking of the Arabic, with compensation for the loss of American lives, both on the Arabic and on the Lusitania, is expected.

ON the heels of this whole pacific development in the situation came a personal call on President Wilson by Cardinal Gibbons, as a special representative of Pope Benedict, to deliver a written message from the Pope which is understood to propose to the President an early and definite move for mediation and peace. The activities of the Vatican in the interests of peace have recently been of a nature to invest Cardinal Gibbons' mission with peculiar significance. The contents of the papal note were not given out for publication, nor is it yet known what may result in Washington.

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Indépendance Belge

THOUGH continuing for the sake of clearness the division of the campaign in Russia into the two sections, north and south, along the line drawn through Jvno, and south of this line, the events of the past week make it advisable to create another division by drawing an east-and-west line through Kovol west of Lublin and east along the railway running to the Dnieper River from that point, the latter division running south of the northern border of Rumania.

In a very broad sense these divisions present the left, center and right wings of the Teutonic forces, and in another sense they represent three distinct campaigns: the left wing the Petrograd campaign, the center the attempt to crush the bulk of the Russian field army, and the right wing the campaign against south Russia, of which the preliminary movements have begun.

Taking up first the events of the past week (ending September 1) to the north of Kovno, while there have been no new developments in the immediate vicinity of Riga, there have been movements to the south and to the east of that city which will eventually have influence on the fate of that town.

One force of Germans, which last week had begun to advance from the south of Eckau almost directly east, has now, after some rather heavy fighting, been successful in establishing itself at several places southeast of Riga, on the Missae River and about twenty to thirty miles south and southwest of it on the Duna River (Dvina), thus interposing itself as a wedge between Riga and towns still farther to the east, menacing all communication between them.

Farther southeast another German force has captured the defenses of the village of the Ekau River at Tauerkaln, and the last defenses of the strategically important town of Friedland on the Duna River, the fall of which town seems very close at hand. Its fall would be of great importance as a breach in the third line of Russian defenses, and would also compel the Russians to abandon both Riga and Dunaburg, and the abandonment of Dunaburg would compel Vilna's being given up immediately, even though no further blows were struck at that town by the German forces to the west of it, so interdependent are these places.

Farther south the German line is also moving to the eastward steadily; their line now running south, following in a general sense the line of the Jara River to the point of its junction with the Swenta, and thence following the Swenta to Janow, northeast of Kovno. To the east of this line as far as the Petrograd-Warsaw Railway, the country is very boggy and full of small lakes and wide-reaching marshes.

In the campaign south of Kovno, the principal event of the week was the surrender and evacuation of the great fortress of Brest-Litovsk on the Bug River. As to exactly what happened, the accounts differ. The Germans say that after reducing the exterior defenses on the northwest front by the use of heavy artillery, their infantry entered through to the breach thus made, and stormed and took the interior forts, capturing many prisoners and much artillery, besides an enormous quantity of munitions of war and military stores. The Russians, on the other hand, say that they evacuated the fortress, leaving only a comparatively small garrison, and had succeeded in sending off the bulk of their supplies, etc., to the interior. It is certain that the attempt to cut the Russian lines of retreat did not succeed. However, the entry into possession of the fortress was in itself a very important event, in that it completely and irretrievably punctured the Russian second line of defense and made further operations on this long line, extending from Kovno to Kovol, mere routine work.

After the fall of the fortress a pursuit of the retreating Russians was immediately begun by the armies of Prince Leopold of Bavaria and General von Mackensen, and has steadily continued.

The troops of the left wing of Prince Leopold's army, following after the Russians, first cleared the forest of Bjelowjosh, and then advancing to the eastward attacked the Russians on the eastern bank of the upper Narew, and after driving them therefrom advanced to the line of Schimki-Dobrowolja-Nowy-Dwar. While these events were happening on the left, the center and the right drove northeasterly, north of the line of the Brest-Litovsk-Minsk railway.

South of the railroad, the army of General von Mackensen has been moving eastward during this time along both banks of the Muchawez. In the meantime a very large force of cavalry has been thrown northeastwardly from Kovol toward and beyond the Dnieper-Bug Canal. The Russian resistance was at no point particularly determined.

While these things were taking place in the Brest-Litovsk section, farther north Bieloostok and a minor fortress also changed owners, and the German movement against Grodno, the only one of the Russian second line fortresses still in Russian possession, made headway. By successive advances during the week, particularly on the western and southern fronts of Grodno, which involved the capture of Now Dvor to the west and of Kusaiza on the south, the German lines drew a semicircle around this stronghold and the last reports available for this article inform us that these lines are now in front of Grodno's outer line of forts, and that as soon as the heavy artillery is brought up the bombardment of the stronghold will begin. This fortress is a great factor in protecting the general Russian retreat to the northeast.

Turning now to the third, the new campaign, which is taking place south of Kovol. During the past week an offensive movement has been started from Wladimir Wolynskif south of Kovol in Russia, and from Sokal on the Bug in extreme northeastern Galicia, directed at the Russian fortress of Lusk on the railroad from Kovol to Rovno.

Probably the real objective is Rovno, but as Lusk intervenes, this fortress will have to be captured before Rovno can be attacked. During the week there has been hard fighting in this sector, but the advance has made progress.

In eastern Galicia, where all has been comparatively quiet for many weeks past, hostilities were suddenly resumed during the past week. The Austrians made a determined attack on the Russian lines along the Koropice River, running north and south, parallel with the Zlota Lipa, and drove them out of their positions, pushing them to the eastward and across the Strypa River, on the east bank of which the Russians succeeded in making a stand, and along which line, as this record closes, furious fighting is going on.

It is very possible that these movements south of Kovol are not unconnected with the concentration of a large force of troops of the Teutonic allies on the Rumanian border, which concentration—judging from the reports which reach us alike from London, Paris, Sofia and Bucharest—appears to be a fact. Assuming it as fact, it becomes interesting to consider its objective. There are two possible objectives: the first, South Russia and Odessa, and the second, Turkey, via Serbia and Bulgaria.

Taking up the second objective first. On its extreme east, the distance across Serbia from the Austrian border to Bulgaria is only about forty miles, and from the point at which the northwestern frontier of Bulgaria would be touched, across Bulgaria to Turkey, is about 275 miles. If Bulgaria were friendly, this route would present no particular difficulty; but if Bulgaria chose to interpose an armed resistance, the forcing of a way through the Balkan mountain range would become an arduous task, and, furthermore, it would be quite difficult to maintain an open line of communication. If Bulgaria did resist in arms, in all probability she would be aided by Rumania and Greece.

The New Hosannah

SHARPLY the noise of cannon breaks
The stillness of the day;
The sullen wreaths of powder smoke
Curl blackly far away.
An ancient building totters, falls—
And blood-stained men dash by,
A pistol snaps, and some one screams,
And, "In God's name!" they cry.

TWAS many, many years ago,
When, coming from afar,
A gentle mother brought her Child;
The glimmer of a star
Lay in her eyes, and when she sang,
The baby smiling lay;
He little dreamed of care or pain,
But watched the sunlight play
Among the waving leaves of green,
And on the dusty way.

PERHAPS, beneath some curving arch,
She stilled Him into sleep—
Perhaps, upon some temple floor,
He learned, at first, to creep.
And when, perhaps, the time had come,
When he must seek His way;
He left the shadow of a smile.
It lingers there today,
In shady nook and desert pool,
For—guns to sweep away.

HARSHLY, the shrieks of dying men,
And horses deep in pain,
Creep through the land, and mothers' tears
Beat down like autumn rain.
The temple shows a ragged scar,
The desert pool is dry—
And blood, blood, blood is on the land,
As "In God's name!" they cry.

The Crown of Life

SUNDAY, September 19. James 1: 12. "He shall receive the crown of life." Every act of fidelity is rewarded with a crown of life. The faithful soul is more alive after every deed of faithfulness. The deed has enlarged the soul's capacity for life and in these realms increased capacity always means increased reception. Obedience makes a soul more roomy for a fuller entertainment of God. The opening bud offers larger hospitality to the warm sunlight, and the gracious energy fills it to the utmost limit. We grow by our obedience, and every moment we are being crowned with life.

And so it is that life is being given in the midst of the battle. Reinforcements arrive while we grapple with these. Streams of spiritual vitality are pouring into the heroic soul even while the warfare is yet unaccomplished. The Lord does not withhold his gift of life until life is spent. He imparts his gift of life while we are giving it away, and we are gaining life even when we seem to lose it. In the very act of striking a blow at the devil, we become more like our God. We are on something of Christ Jesus. We become partakers of a divine nature. We are crowned with life.

And thus it happens that we may have seeming defeat joined with more glorious victory. We may find a day with a slender purse and yet be enriched with spiritual glory. We may have less money and more life. We may lose an affluent office and acquire a nobler character. We may lose a transient honor, and yet be wearing an invisible crown. Yes, we may lose the world and gain God! Moral heroism always finds the springs of vitality. Always and everywhere it is crowned with life.

And at the end, when the brief and honorable career is over, life will be unveiled in inconceivable powers. "Then shall we be manifested with Him in glory." In that more intimate fellowship "the day of heaven breaks." The crown is one of ever-decreasing radiance. It is life added to life, in spiritual and eternal glory. J. H. J.

God's Hand Leading Those Who Trust Him

MONDAY, September 20. Isaiah 44: 21-28. "That I might say of Cyrus, he is my shepherd, and shall perform all my pleasure." Cyrus is one of the noblest figures in ancient history. Herodotus and Xenophon are loud in his praise. His character became a model for the Greek youth. His career was a perfect marvel of success. From being the chieftain of an obscure Persian tribe he became the conqueror of the mighty Babylon. All this time, though religious according to his light, he did not know Jehovah, who by his means was about to realize the restoration of the Jews to the own land. In spite of apparent unlikelihood, he would perform the counsel of the Hebrew prophets, and would finally say to Jerusalem, "She shall be inhabited."

We are all conscious of an element in our life which we cannot account for. Other men have started life under better auspices and larger advantages, but they have dropped behind in the race, while we have gone from strength to strength. We cannot attribute this to any superior merit on our part; and we are deeply conscious that God's hand has been upon us for good that we might perform his pleasure. It was his hand that opened those doors of opportunity, that smoothed the rough paths, that unlocked gates of brass which had threatened to make our way impossible. It is one of the joys of mature life to trace all the way by which he has led us; and it will be the cause of adoring gratitude as we review our life-course from the heights of paradise. Be of good cheer! He will finish what he began! Not one good thing will fail! His angel will redeem thee from all evil. F. B. M.

"Overcoming" the World

TUESDAY, September 21. Revelation 2: 7. "To him that overcometh, to him will I give to eat of the tree of life." Revelation is to many a difficult book; it seems other-worldly, mystical and transcendental. A message like the above is lost to us because we think of reference to a future world, while it really has to do with this world, the hours of our everyday modern life. As we read on the carved marble of an East Indian temple: "If paradise is anywhere, it is here, it is here!"

Christ taught that Christianity is not asceticism, nor weak conformity to the world. It is rather the rising up of the human spirit to intimate association with God by prayer and praise and by service to others until everything that God has given men to enjoy in nature and in this great world can be claimed as a right and privilege. There is only a restricted liberty to him who is a child in selfishness and perverted will. But when we realize that "all is yours," as the apostle puts it, because we have turned our energies not on upon ourselves, but out upon the world in giving and in turn receiving, we are heirs to all the ages. Drummond's advice to a young man who was filled with forebodings about his soul was: "Go out and do something for somebody!"

"He that overcometh" is the man who lives with God, and thereby gets the right to live with men and with nature and with all things in this wonderful world, "have sin and wrong. Nothing is 'common or unclean' to him who sees life through pure eyes. The more religious we are the more does all the world become to us 'the paradise of God.' Even the city streets and the noise of the mill speak of our triumph, and nature becomes to us as to Francis of Assisi, 'my brother the wind, my sister the rain.' Overcoming the world is to obliterate the landmarks between the secular and religious through the vision that is not self-conscious but sacrificial. Overcoming is serving in the spirit of our Master. C. S. C.

A Light to Our Feet

WEDNESDAY, September 22. John 12: 37-50. "I am come a light into the world, that whosoever believeth in me may not abide in the darkness." The life of Jesus, looked at from the human standpoint, was perpetually in-filled with God. There was no part dark in the Holy of Holies of his being. The clear shining of the Divine illumined it with transcendent beauty and radiance. To see him was to see God; to hear him was to hear the Father speaking through him; to believe on him was to touch God. All that was true of him during his human ministry is true today, and they who open their hearts to him, without shutter or blind, become illumined with the same inner light. They no longer abide in darkness.

This belief in Christ includes not only the open heart but the obedient will. Charles Lamb states the truth precisely when he says concerning one who had been greatly afflicted: "He gave his heart to the Purifier, and his will to the Sovereign Will of the Universe." If heart and will are kept open to Christ, there will be no shadow of irresolution, timidity, or impurity; and, to use Dante's memorable sentence, "In his will shall be your peace." There is no duty, no moment, no trial in life, in which the Lord Jesus is not at hand. You may not see or feel him, yet always believe that there is no furnace but he treads the glowing embers; no storm but he walks the turbulent waves; no Patmos-isle but he appears as Alpha and Omega. Let us resist the impulse to act on our own initiative, and recognize that he must give a commandment what we should say and do. His will is indicated by his Spirit within and circumstances without. Trust his leading! This is the essence of the religious life. F. B. M.

The Sunday Spirit

THURSDAY, September 23. Revelation 1: 10. "I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day, and I heard behind me a great voice, as of a trumpet." The Bible throughout gives emphasis to the spiritual interpretation of life. It is not strange then that we find the seer of Patmos starting the great allegorical poem with this thought of his readiness to behold heavenly scenes. He was in the Spirit on the Lord's day. It was not the place in which he happened to be, it was not the thing he was doing, but the spirit of his mind, the attitude of his soul, that was the matter of chief importance.

What is this spirit of the Lord's day, that is worthy of our cultivation? George Matheson once said that "the spirit of the Lord's day is the spirit of retrospective rest." It is to be able to look back on the week's work and find it a matter of satisfaction—a restful memory. It is the joy of seeing well-done work. Robert Louis Stevenson said: "I know what pleasure is, for I have done good work." In the Genesis account of Creation we read that "God saw everything that he had made, and behold, it was very good." John, in the verse of the day, represents the voice coming from behind him—as if out of the past.

Our twentieth century days are filled with the present and the pressing on to the future. "Tomorrow" is the great word. We have little time or inclination for thinking of the past. We are too busy to strike often the chord of memory. Ill for the nation or for the individual that disregards the lessons of the past. Experience is only a great teacher, when we allow her to teach by listening to her messages. Sunday is a day when we may cultivate the spirit of retrospect. It is not only a day for worship, but for review, for counting our blessings, for marking our progress, for drawing counsel from our mistakes. To be in the Spirit on the Lord's day is to rest. It is to view even our failures in a new light, as we see them from the vantage ground of companionship with the Spirit of God. C. S. C.

The Secret of Grace and Peace

FRIDAY, September 24. Thessalonians 1: 1-12. "Grace to you and peace from God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ." Grace was the ordinary salutation of the West, peace of the East. The outgoings of the morning and the evening greet the devout soul. We need both grace and peace: Grace to help in our times of need, and peace to keep our heart and mind. The one as the blue vault of heaven above us, with its smile of sun and breath of air and reviving rain; the other as the blue depths of the ocean, tranquil and calm.

There was no lack of either grace or peace in the life of Jesus, because he dwelt ever in the bosom of the Father; and neither was lacking in the life of Paul. He said that the grace of God had been bestowed on him very abundantly, and had been more than sufficient to compensate for his physical weakness; and as to peace, it was from his own experience that he said it passed understanding, and could keep the heart and mind. One secret of this grace and peace consists in the unbroken fellowship of the soul with the Source of both. "Grace to you and peace from . . ." It should be the habit of us all to understand by experience those memorable words of the late Mr. Gladstone, one of the busiest of men, and engaged through a long life in great concerns. To one of his sons at Oxford he wrote a little paper of suggestions which were the transcription of his own life-long habit and unbroken practice; and among them occurs the following: "One thing I would say, that it is not difficult, and it is most beneficial, to cultivate the habit of inwardly turning the thoughts to God, though but for a moment, in the course or during the intervals of our business, which is continually presenting occasions requiring his aid and guidance." F. B. M.

Jesus' Oneness with the Father

SATURDAY, September 25. John 1: 18. "The only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him." Christ was God manifested before he became man. In all Jewish history he was revealing the Father. He expressed God in nature, creating the universe. Before the worlds were, he was preexistent, manifesting the Infinite One. He did not change his mission when he entered manhood, for he is the same yesterday, today and forever. As he displayed divine power, beauty and order in creation, he revealed divine love in redemption. Through all eternity, Christ will continue to be the Revealer to all the intelligences of the universe. He is God in nature, God in holy manhood, God in Providence, God in Kingship, in Saviourship, God over all and blessed for evermore.

He that has Christ's Spirit hath the Father's love. "He that hath the Son hath the Father, and he that hateth me hateth my Father also." Would you behold the holiness of God? It is reflected on the face of Jesus Christ. Would you know the Father's love? Contemplate the agonies of Calvary. All the divine attributes are radiant in the person, power and glory of the only begotten Son of God. E. W. C.

A Triumph for Humanity

PEACE hath her victories, no less renowned than war," and the fortunate conclusion of our long controversy with Germany relative to her submarine warfare, which has kept the whole country at high tension for many weeks, must be set down as a victory for humanity, for international law and for international friendship.

Both governments are to be congratulated on this gratifying outcome. There were times when the situation grew sharp and bitter, and came perilously near to the breaking point. Public feeling in both countries was doubtless heightened by misunderstandings; but patience and mutual forbearance have worked wonders. Germany now knows that the United States was seeking no quarrel, but only asked protection for its citizens and an honorable recognition of the rights of non-combatants generally.

The sequel shows that our arguments have received full consideration. In the note delivered on September 1 by the German Ambassador to our State Department, the assurance is conveyed that the Berlin Government accepts the basic principle for which we contended, that hereafter liners will not be sunk by German submarines without warning, and without regard to the safety of the lives of non-combatants, provided the liners "do not try to escape or offer resistance." It is further explained in the Ambassador's note that this decision was reached by the German Government before the Arabic incident occurred. This disposes of the presumption that that incident could have been the result of a "deliberately unfriendly" act.

Carried out to its fullest extent, the principle set forth in the German note will merit the approval, not of this nation only, but of neutrals throughout the world. It applies equally to all liners, and to the non-combatant passengers and crews of any nationality. This government throughout the controversy has stood as the spokesman and advocate of other lands as well as our own, claiming that the freedom of the seas should be equally enjoyed by all non-combatant travelers. This is the broad and generous principle which Germany has now adopted—the principle which was set forth in our note of May 13.

While the Ambassador's note may be regarded as a preliminary summary, which will no doubt be amplified when the full views of his government are officially communicated, it nevertheless contains the essence of the whole question at issue, and is so clear and unequivocal that any later note must be largely a matter of detail.

In congratulating ourselves on this achievement in diplomacy, which has led to an honorable and peaceful adjustment, satisfactory to the whole country, we should not overlook the fact that Germany, in order to concede our demands, has waived all objections and even set aside the strong predilections of some of her own advisers, for the sake of preserving peaceful and friendly relations.

There should now be an end to the needless disputation in the press and elsewhere, which in the past six months has greatly added to the perplexities of a difficult situation.

The Jew and the World

EVERY new turn of history makes the Jewish race more amazingly and compellingly interesting. Nations and civilizations rise and fall; boundary lines are banished; races, by subjugation or intermarriage, disappear; ideals and patriotism change; instincts of world citizenship and dreams of world federation steal with growing clearness and strength over the heart of mankind—while the Jew goes steadily on; the man without a country, yet the citizen of every country, of a distinct and unmixed race, yet contributing to the life of every race, linked by the clearest records of all nations to the world's past and holding in his life the clearest hints of a good age to come, the Jew goes on his steady way through the centuries, the one racial marvel of the world.

These thoughts are suggested by the report of a recent pageant in Prospect Park, Brooklyn, in which more than a thousand Jewish girls portrayed for three hours Jewish characters and history. The first tableau brought the history of the Jew to the Babylonian Captivity; the second depicted the Roman domination; the third, bridging a gap of a thousand years, depicted the wanderings of the Jew during the Middle Ages; the fourth showed the life of the Jew today, one part in the lands where the Jew is suffering, the other in the lands where he is allowed to develop and expand, typified by a score of strong-bodied bright-eyed men and women full of hope and gladness.

It is beautiful to note how, even unconsciously, the Jews are adopting the spirit and the thoughts of Christianity. In New York's East Side, Jewish children celebrate Christmas and exchange Christmas wishes as gleefully as the boys and girls of Christian homes. Hatreds and fears of the past are dying out. Here in America the Jew has received his highest vision of world brotherhood, world service and an immortal hope. Hand in hand, as the seers and apostles prophesied long ago, Jew and Gentile, under the leadership of that Jewish Peasant who is to become the Saviour of the world, shall enter the New Age of love, joy and peace.

Working Hand in Hand with God

MAN'S work passes away, but that of the divine Master Builder remains and endures. Wars, conquests, kingdoms, nations, rise and fall. Even the greatest of them lasts but for a time and then disappears. Travelers in an Asian desert uncovered in the sand a pillar erected by an unknown monarch, who styled himself "King of Kings," and challenged the whole world to look upon his "mighty works and despair." Yet the conqueror and his deeds are long since forgotten—blotted out by the hand of time.

It is not so with the work of the divine Master Builder. What he begins goes on increasingly to fulfillment. In these eventful days, many seem to forget this. Let the timid souls who fear lest God has forgotten the world and lest his work in the hearts of men should be dying out amid the chaos of war and devastation, look at the state of two continents—Asia and Africa. A century ago they were practically closed to the Gospel; now there are 22,000 white missionaries there, and over 90,000 native Christian pastors and evangelists; the Bible is read in more than 500 languages and dialects; there are 30,000 Protestant schools and colleges, 160 mission publishing-houses, 400 mission hospitals and 500 orphanages. It is estimated that today there are nearly nine million living Protestant Christians in those two continents, while many millions more have lived and died there in the Christian faith.

Although Europe is now submerged in strife, the cloud will pass and the great war will become little more than a memory. Divine wisdom will make of this great affliction a mighty lever to bring the nations nearer to God. Having passed through the furnace of fire, they will seek his grace and protection with a deeper zeal than before.

It is only the spiritually blind who believe they can foresee the rout of religion in the war. It is rather the rout of irreligion that is impending. If the church has failed to avert the war, its eyes have been opened to its failure, and it is now on its knees, confessing its great error. It has breathed into its young men the war spirit, instead of filling them with the Christ-Spirit. The complaisance yielded by the church to the demands of the world's militarism has multiplied the slaughter and the suffering. It had forgotten that Christ himself said: "My kingdom is not of this world, else would my children fight." On its own battle-ground, and no other, is the church progressive and invincible. It must get back to Christ.

The reaction, which has already begun in Europe and sympathetically here also, must vitalize the church anew. It will be swept along on the tide, which is surely turning Godward. It is a time not for despondency, but for strong faith and courage; for confidence in the divine promise of the world's spiritual reawakening and for courage to labor on in cooperation with God to carry out his purposes. Triumph awaits those who work bravely in faith for that which may be nearer even than we think.

The Foundations Assailed

AS PROMISED last week, we mention again conclusions reached in the main report of the Walsh Commission on the subject of the great Foundations. The report finds that they are an actual menace to the nation's welfare.

The most dangerous element of the situation is, according to this report, that the funds of these foundations are invested in the industries of the great corporations whose heads control the foundations also. "The policies of these foundations," the report states, "must inevitably be colored, if not controlled, to conform to the policies of such corporations."

Referring to the plan of the Rockefeller Foundation to investigate industrial conditions, the report declares:

The entrance of the foundations into the field of industrial relations, through the creation of a special division by the Rockefeller Foundation, constitutes a menace to the national welfare to which the attention not only of Congress, but of the entire country should be directed. Backed by the $100,000,000 of the Rockefeller Foundation, this movement has the power to influence the entire country in the determination of its most vital policies.

The report also sounds a warning against the control or influencing of educational institutions by the foundations, and refers to the change made in the charters of some denominational schools so as to come within the provisions of the foundations, and the discharge of certain professors for teaching "economic principles."

Whatever may be thought about the findings of this Commission and whatever Congress may do to avoid the dangers of which warning is given, the work of the Commission and the wide-spread publishing of its findings will help things along. Wise men, good men, have from history's beginnings shared the power of gold. The American people are well warned what havoc great accumulations of capital may work. They have it in their power to say whether they shall be crushed by these golden millstones or whether they shall, as the report advises in its first findings, break them and set themselves free.

Silent Ministry

VERY beautiful and touching is this letter, which comes to us from a Vermont reader:

"It was after grandfather's death, when we were looking over some of his old diaries, that we noticed how often he had a sermon in the Christian Herald. He must have been in good luck because he made a note of it in his diary—'Cold and stormy day. Did not go to church. Read a sermon in the Christian Herald. We felt to wondering whether our children and grandchildren would ever read in our diaries. Read a sermon in the Christian Herald today.' They may surely read. Did not go to church today, even if the church is just around the corner, instead three or four miles away, as it was for grandfather. We can't take the steady step of those who attend the house of worship near, and the rush and whirl of the autos bearing others away comes of pleasure. It is well to visit the sick, to make glad the hearts of distant beloved ones—to do good on the Sabbath Day; it is the thought which survives bears a sermon to us, long after and in a rest after his life of toil. His poor old hands are folded in his patient heart has ceased to beat; but the thought which was penned will endure forever: 'Read a sermon today.'"

While we know from many indications that the weekly Sermon in the Christian Herald is ready a very large audience, it should not be forgotten that the very best place to hear the word preached is in the Lord's house. There is nothing that can adequately make up for the loss of the great joy and privilege of Sunday worship. "A day spent in the courts is better than a thousand" elsewhere. No one who can attend service in His temple could "forsake the assembling." The right place for every professing Christian is in his own pew on Sunday, where with his dear ones, and surrounded by friends and neighbors, he unites with a section of the church on earth in those exercises that are a means of spiritual refreshing and consolation, and that give strength for the duties of the coming week. There are, however, very many who, through no fault of their own, are unable to share in this privilege. Age, sickness, or any one of a variety of causes, may prevent their attendance in church. To the invalid, the shut-in, the aged and feeble saints, and to those who live in remote places, far from any church, the weekly sermon in their favorite journal is a very real blessing. It is a great gratification for us to know that thousands are reached with the preached Word in this way who would otherwise be inaccessible, and that this silent ministry is not an ineffective one, but a means of grace to many.

Comment by the Way

—It is announced from Washington that a Federal Employment Agency will shortly be established, in an experimental way, through which the government will endeavor to bring employers and the unemployed into closer communication. Commissioner General Caminetti, the chief of the immigration bureau, has conferred with the labor departments of the various states and the authorities of the leading municipalities on the practical methods of dealing with the unemployment question. It is hoped that some plan, with the aid of the press, of distributing idle men in sections where it can be quickly used to advantage.

Politeness Saved Cows

A midnight lightning struck a large four-story barn on a dairy farm near Montclair, N. J., starting a fire that destroyed it. It looked as if the two hundred splendid milk cows which the barn contained would certainly perish, but they were all rescued in a singular manner. In harmony with the general belief that the kind treatment of cows is conducive to an increased yield in milk, the owner of the dairy had required the gentlest voice and manner in the handling of the creatures on the part of all his employees. Men who were rude enough with the cows were discharged. The overseer first discovered the fire, and summoned all the men, who in the gentlest manner went about among them, and calling them by their names, led them in perfect order from the building. And, though burning embers were falling about them, not one of the two hundred cows was lost. A rougher treatment might have stampeded the animals and made their rescue unlikely, if not impossible. Politeness has an economic value. It will make a cow give more milk; it will get better service out of an employee, human or animal; it will help a boy or girl to get a job and hold it. But that is the lowest incentive to courtesy. Courtesy ought to come out of a tender heart and from love for others. The ideal gentleman—or gentlewoman—is the Christian. This kindness is a divine attribute, which is manifested toward us, and is potential in our development and destiny. "Thy gentleness hath made me great." (II Sam. 22:36.)

Mosquitoes Nearly Killed Man

BEING unconscious in a swamp in Big Peace Meadows near Caldwell, N. J., the other afternoon, a camper was found bitten nearly to death by mosquitoes. His face was terribly swollen and his hands and legs were twice their normal size. He was hried by train to New York City for treatment. With gentlemen friends he was spending his vacation at this camp along the Passaic River. He left his camp, saying he was going to hunt for berries. He got into the swamp, and in going from one stone to another he strained his ankle so badly that he could not walk. He sat down and called for help. The mosquitoes descended in swarms upon him and stung him into insensibility, which would probably have been his last sleep had he not been discovered and rescued. There are always pests ready to sting and if possible destroy the body. There are the vexatious cares that are painful and hurtful to the disposition, there are swarms of little sins that annoy, sting and poison the soul. It is not necessary to commit a great crime to destroy the life of the soul. The myriads of little sins will sting, and, if not resisted, poison it to death. It is the little sins that often spoil life's fragrance. "Take us the foxes, the little fens, that spoil the vines; for our vines have tender grapes." (Song of Sol. 2:15.)

Financially Independent, Starved

A MYSTERIOUS character recently died of starvation in a furnished room. He was a member of a real estate firm and went to business each day. He was so severely economical that he left his room in New York because they had his rent a little. He went over to Vahawken, where he got a room for a dollar and a half a week and cooked his own meals. As his fondness for money increased, as it is likely to do, he allowed himself less food, and less wholesome food, till at last the authorities say he literally died of starvation. After his death it was found that he owned $50,000 of property in his own name, and had ready money also. His partner knew nothing about his history, and is trying to find whether he has any relatives or not. The passion for accumulating money has starved the bodies of many, and the souls of many more. Christ uses material starvation as a type of self-inflicted spiritual starvation in the parable. "And I perish with hunger." (Luke 15:17.)

against the liquor traffic, and a telegram from Milan says that a vast number of the dealers will be compelled to go out of business. The nations are obeying this injunction: "Abhor that which is evil; cleave to that which is good." (Rom. 12:9.)

Wireless Wonder-Worker Invented

PROFESSOR B. K. SHEPARD of Medford, Mass., a member of the faculty of Tufts College, claims that his new wireless invention is to work still greater wonders in that already amazing field. With his new wireless apparatus he steers a small boat from shore, rings bells, fires a small cannon, blows horns, guides an automobile and does many other feats. Professor Shepard is now making a wireless submarine destroyer to be operated from a small boat at sea. In case the torpedo misses it can be steered back to the sender. The new invention has no ground wire, and can be carried and operated by hand. Christ thus refers to the mysteries in the realm of matter and spirit: "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth; so is every one that is born of the Spirit." (John 3:8.)

Europe's War on Alcohol

THE fight on alcohol in Europe as a war measure is becoming more determined and severe. Every nation engaged in the conflict has adopted measures materially suppressing the liquor traffic. On August 28 an anti-alcohol bill was introduced into the French Chamber of Deputies by Minister of Finance M. Ribot. This bill, if carried, will abolish what is declared to be the worst feature of the drink evil, namely the privilege now enjoyed by individuals who are permitted to distill brandy from their own fruits. The agricultural districts of the Vosges and Normandy, where alcoholism is most rife, owe their alarming statistics to the flood of cheap spirits from these private stills. The proposed law also places a surtax on liquors and provides for higher licensing duties. M. Ribot says he intends to push the bill into a law if possible. Italy has also taken radical measures for each other; as school children they became engaged, and for thirty-five years their friendship continued without disagreement or cessation. On August 25 they were married. They said they wanted to wait until convinced that their love would last until death. They ran a great risk with the ties that held them. In nine cases out of ten either one or both parties would have insisted on an earlier marriage, or would have looked elsewhere for a life partner. The pure and enduring character of the marital tie is the symbol of Christ's relationship to his church. "I will show thee the bride, the Lamb's wife." (Rev. 21:9.)

Poisoned by Wholesale

THE mortality of waterfowl near Great Salt Lake has attracted widespread interest in recent years, and there have been many speculations as to its cause. Thousands upon thousands of wild ducks, snipe, sandpipers and other birds have perished, and the situation is of more than local importance, as immense numbers of birds stop in this region while migrating, and many of them succumb to the prevailing malady. A similar mortality has been reported at Tulare and Owens lakes in California, and probably occurs at other places in the West. This matter has been recently investigated by the United States Biological Survey, which finds that in all probability the trouble is due to an alkaline poison. The birds probably sicken in the shallow water bordering on the mud flats. As these flats dry after high water, salts and alkalies crystallize on the surface of the ground. Later, when rain falls on the flats, the highly soluble parts are taken up by the water and the birds feeding in it are poisoned. In the mystery of nature there is not a form of life, not even that of the innocent bird, that has not some enemy bent on its destruction. Amid the myriad flocks not one dies without God's notice, and he counts us more valuable than the birds. "Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father." (Matt. 10:29.)

Two Portlands Converse

A VIVID imagination has described this conversation over the telephone between Portland, Maine, and Portland, Oregon. Portland, Maine, says: "We have an appropriate name. We are both ports for ships going and coming from every sea. I am on the Atlantic, and you, though a hundred miles inland, are really on the Pacific, and the largest ocean-going vessels land at your docks." "Yes," Portland, Oregon, replies, "the largest ships do land at my docks in such number as to make me one of the leading lumber exporting ports of the world, and the chief wheat port in the United States." The eastern city says: "I boast of my age, born in 1632, of good English ancestry. I am beautifully situated on a peninsula, have elegant streets, homes, public buildings, industrial institutions, schools and churches. I am the largest city in my state. I am in a prohibition state, and never have been allowed a moment in some fifty years to sell a gill of intoxicants as a beverage." The Portland of the West says: "I began my existence in 1845. You were over two hundred years old then. I do not wish to be boastful, nor make you jealous; but, young as I am, I have a population of 215,000, and am of course the largest city of my state. The fire scourged you July 4, 1866, destroying $10,000,000 worth of property, and fires in 1872 and 1873 caused me unspeakable damage. My state voted dry last November and 300 licensed saloons will all have to close up for good when the new law goes into effect the 1st of January next. Now that the Panama Canal is open, and as more than half of the people of the world live in the Orient, I expect to grow more rapidly than ever, and hope to become one of the greatest cities of the nation in mental, moral and spiritual as well as material things. I will not look down on you, but will remember you gratefully, as two of your citizens established me here in the midst of this beauty and called me after you." The Portland of the Holy Land was Joppa. It was used as the seaport for Jerusalem in David's time. Hiram, king of Tyre, thus answered Solomon's letter about material for the temple: "And we will cut wood out of Lebanon, as much as thou shalt need; and we will bring it to thee in floats by sea to Joppa; and thou shalt carry it up to Jerusalem." (II Chron. 2:16.)

Here Are The New REO M

Look at the Cars, Consider the Value and Read Carefully the Explanation

WE FEEL WE MUST EXPLAIN to our more intelligent readers why and how it is possible to place such cars in your hands at such unheard of prices.

FOR WITHOUT THAT EXPLANATION—without reasons so logical they must satisfy you—you could not understand, could not accept, these values as genuine.

OF COURSE THE PRICES ALONE would not astonish—might not even interest—you. For mere price taken by itself, indicates nothing to the intelligent buyer.

BESIDES YOU'VE BEEN SURFEITED with announcements of "big cars at little prices"—this year more than ever before.

MOST MAKERS SEEM TO HAVE LOST THEIR HEADS in the fierce battle of price competition. As a result you've seen price reductions that indicated to your mind clearly one of two things—either that the value was not there last season or couldn't be this.

SO MERE PRICE—EVEN THESE sensational new Reo prices—would interest you only mildly if at all.

BUT KNOWING AS YOU DO REO STANDARDS of excellence in materials and manufacture; knowing as you do the Reo reputation for making only cars of sterling quality; knowing and estimating as you will, Reo integrity in selling as well as in making, you must marvel at these prices.

YOU KNOW THESE TWO REOS—you know that in all the world there have never been two models that enjoyed greater popularity.

AND RIGHTLY SO—for we maintain that these are the ripest, the most refined, and the most nearly perfect automobiles ever turned out of any factory—simply because they have been made in their present form—in all essentials—for more years than any others, and more time, and more experience, more skill, and more care have been devoted to refining and perfecting them.

BOTH REO MODELS—Reo the Fifth, "The Incomparable Four," and the new Reo Six—have long since passed the experimental stage. Both have been tried and proven—and not by factory testers, but by thousands and tens of thousands of owners, and in every land.

THINK WHAT THAT MEANS. Consider the satisfaction it is to us to know—to know absolutely—that every car that leaves this factory in the coming year will carry with it absolute satisfaction—absolute certainty of satisfaction—to its new owner.

THIS YEAR OF ALL YEARS we are glad we have nothing radically new, nothing experimental—nothing even doubtful or questionable to offer our hosts of friends.

OF COURSE WE CONSIDERED this matter from every angle. We are conversant—have been for months—with everything others were trying to do.

OUR ENGINEERS ARE JUST AS ALERT as others—just as enterprising and just as prone to experiment and to explore new and interesting fields. They enjoy working mechanical puzzles just as keenly as any. But—

MOST OF ALL WE CONSIDERED it from the standpoint of those thousands and thousands of friends who have learned to lean upon us, secure in the belief that we will offer them nothing but that of which we ourselves are sure.

"BUT THE PRICES?" YOU ASK. "Why and how were these necessary and possible. Why necessary—how possible for this product, not merely as good as formerly, but better." WE WILL ANSWER THAT QUERY.

IT WASN'T NECESSARY—any more than it was necessary to devote the thought and the energy and the expense to the improvement of cars that already represented value great that every Reo car was snapped up the instant it came from the factory.

IT WASN'T NECESSARY either to improve the quality to reduce the price—except that it is and always has been the Reo desire to give Reo buyers greater value than can be obtained elsewhere and just as much more value as our experience and superior facilities could give.

BUT IT WAS POSSIBLE—and that was sufficient.

THE REASON IS INTERESTING—interesting and instructive and makes mighty profitable reading to any prospective buyer of an automobile.

A COMBINATION OF FACTORS and conditions that we believe, unique with Reo, made these prices for quality-cars possible.

NO; PRICES OF MATERIALS HAD NOTHING to do with it—prices of no important materials are lower, and prices of many are higher now than a year ago. Only the cost of materials in a car can be reduced this year by reducing quality of materials—using inferior or substandard materials.

YES; THERE IS ANOTHER WAY—the simple expedient of reducing the amount of materials. In other words, reducing the weight of the car.

FOR IT IS A FACT THAT YOU CAN reduce the weight of an automobile twenty-five per cent by the simple process of cutting the weight down that much. Some people say it is dangerous, we believe.

REO CARS ARE LIGHT CARS—but not light in the sense of flimsiness. They are as light as may be with the same degree of safety or durability.

SO THAT EXPEDIENT of cutting down the amount of materials that go into the car was not to be the light of more than was the other of using materials of inferior quality or substitution.

IN THE MAKING OF REOS this year we are using better materials because they are not to be had—but the same quality of materials as formerly. So that isn't the reason for the lower price.

COST OF MAKING IS, HOWEVER, somewhat less, due to the fact that in many ways we have been able to realize a still higher degree of efficiency.

ONE BIG ITEM IN COST REDUCTION of these models was the fact that both had passed the experimental stage.

WHEN WE TELL YOU that, had we found it necessary to project a new model to take the place of either of these, we would have set aside a fund of at least $100,000 to cover the cost of the experiment—and would have had to pay the amount had our plan been to supplant both—where we have been able to place to the credit of Reo for the coming year a fund of at least $200,000.

IT TAKES AT LEAST THREE YEARS to perfect any new automobile model. Anyway it takes that long to get a car to the point of perfection where we are willing to offer it to Reo buyers and back it with the Reo guarantee.

ANOTHER ITEM THAT HELPED tremendously was the fact that the tool cost on both these famous models had since been absorbed—charged off—permanently absorbed.

WHY YOU COULD COME and visit us at the Reo fac-

THE FACTORY ORGANIZATION the Reo Dealer rganation has been with us from the first. Many of the rincipal Reo dealers have sold Reos exclusively ever since e fir Reo was made.

THE THEM INTO OUR CONFIDENCE to a greater agrehan is usual in this business. We have no secrets om em.

AT WHY REO DEALERS are so loyal—they know—ney not guess, they know—that in Reo cars they give eir stomers more value than they can find elsewhere.

ALL HIS SEASON WE WERE CONFRONTED with a robil—price competition to an extent greater than ever efor.

REALERS INSISTED that, even though fortified with eo ality and prestige, still they could not wholly ignore rice mpetition.

CC TENDED that price did not matter; that it fooled oon—or at most only a small percentage of buyers and ney at the most desirable.

Lansing, Mich, U. S. A.

WE SHOWED THEM that the cost of making Reos could not be materially lessened without reducing the quality—and that our plan was to improve the quality wherever possible.

WHY, WE REO FOLK wouldn't want to be in business if we couldn't feel we could make better cars this year than last; next year than this!

WE SET OUR OWN STANDARDS and will always ignore those of others—at least when they trend downward!

BUT THEY PROTESTED that the average buyer saw only the price tag. That while he saw the reduction in price he did not notice the reduction in quality—in value. So they wanted a competitive price on Reos as well as Reo quality in the product.

THERE WAS ONLY ONE WAY it could be done—that was if the dealers would agree to handle Reo cars on a smaller margin of profit than is the rule with other cars. We told them that if they would agree to that, we could set a price on Reo cars that would create a genuine sensation.

AND THEY AGREED! It is an unprecedented action.
And that the hundreds of Reo Distributors assented to the plan was due to another unique condition—namely, the extremely low cost of selling and of giving service on Reo cars.

A CANVASS SHOWED this remarkable fact: That the average cost of the dealer's guarantee on a Reo car—the cost of keeping it in perfect running order and its buyer thoroughly satisfied was less than six dollars per car per year!

JUST COMPARE THAT with the cost of maintaining some makes of cars.

WHY, ONE OF OUR DEALERS who handled two other lines last season—but who declares, most vehemently, he will handle Reos exclusively hereafter—tells us that the average cost to him per car on one of those lines was $60 and on the other $49—while Reo averaged in his case $4.75 per car per year!

AND THAT WASN'T ALL. The factor that Reo Distributors consider most important is the customer—satisfied or the reverse. For you must know that though that dealer spent $60 to keep a certain car running he still could not keep the man to whom he had sold that car satisfied—not even by taking it back and standing the full loss himself.

HE COULD NOT REIMBURSE him in dollars for the delays, the disappointments and the aggravations he had suffered.

SO REOS WILL BE SOLD in the future on a lesser margin from dealer to user (and factory margin has always been as close as was safe) than any other automobile in the same class or of higher price.

AND YOU AS A REO BUYER get the full benefit.

AND YOU GET MORE THAN THAT. You get more than a Reo at the unprecedented price.

YOU RECEIVE AN ASSURANCE, a guarantee that cannot be over-estimated—in the fact that Reo cars have proven so good—so absolutely dependable—so economical in upkeep and operation—so wonderfully satisfying to their owners that those dealers feel they can handle them on that small margin.

WE THINK WE HAVE PROVEN TO YOU how and why, and therefore, that you do receive a higher percentage of value for your money when you buy a Reo than is possible in most, or perhaps any other automobile.

Concerning In-Laws

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

ONE of my married girls wrote to me a rather weepy little letter a few days ago. "Somehow," she said, "I cannot seem to get along with my mother-in-law. We have nothing in common, and it seems as if we are always at swords' points over some little difficulty. I love my husband very much, and I think she loves him equally well; but somehow we cannot love each other, for she seems to resent my place in the household, my authority, and even my affection for him. What shall I do?"

Since I have been receiving letters from my different pen-and-ink friends and members of the Christian Herald Family I have read not a few letters of this type from daughters-in-law—and, yes, mothers-in-law, too. For they have their side of the matter as well. And in almost every letter there is the same bitter little cry, "We have nothing in common."

It's mean, isn't it, to pick flaws in the logic of a letter, and yet whenever a mother-in-law or a daughter-in-law writes to me there is one flaw that can usually be discovered in her logic. When they say, "We have nothing in common," they each forget one thing: the mother-in-law forgets that she loves her son and that her daughter-in-law loves him too. That gives them something in common that should be a very close tie.

Some of my girls have children, and some of the children are little boys—little boys that I have read many letters about. Their mothers tell me that they have curls, maybe, and dimples, and tiny, clinging, dependent little hands that stretch out to them. In their letters I read passages like this: "Through the open window I can see him playing in a huge field of daisies. His little golden head is bobbing among them as a great sunflower. I cannot bear to think of him as a grown-up man; he will always be my baby." That's the voice of the mother spirit that speaks in the heart of every woman.

A boy, even a baby boy with golden hair, is bound to grow up. It's the nature of things. He graduates from the stage when he likes to climb into the mother lap and be kissed and petted and given cookies; graduates all too quickly. It is not long before he is engrossed in the mysteries of fishing tackle, and football games, and hunting trips. Very soon his scrubby little knickerbockers grow into long trousers, his dependent little hands that used to flutter softly like small white butterflies among the flowers, grow large and strong and able to fight for themselves against the world. And the mother, with an aching heart, wonders what has happened to her baby. While she is wondering the baby, grown up, looks deep into the eyes of some girl—some strange girl—and falls in love with her and gets married and brings his mother a daughter whom she hardly knows. So the mother, because the voice of the mother spirit is still saying in her heart, "He will always be my baby," resents the new daughter's place in the household, her authority, and even her affection for her husband.

My married girl went on with her letter in this strain: "My father-in-law," she told me, "is rather wonderful. He seems to love me as if I were his own daughter, not his daughter-in-law. He seems to understand me so much more than she does."

Oh, friends of mine who cannot get on with your mothers-in-law, but whose fathers-in-law are wonderful, remember that the father never stitched the dreams of a lifetime into tiny baby dresses, and never sang lullabys as he rocked a helpless little baby to sleep and stilled its weak cries; for a father loves his son with the love of one man for another, a love that is half affection and half understanding. A father can never understand the jealousy (for it is jealousy) that causes dissension between the mother and her daughter-in-law. He has no reason to feel the jealousy.

I once knew a mother and daughter-in-law who got along with so much love and understanding that never a quarrel rippled the sea of their domestic happiness. The son and husband was never made unhappy by strained relations in the home. He was never told dramatically, as alas, a great many sons and husbands are told, "You must choose between us!" The mother and daughter-in-law loved each other with a love that seemed strong and too perfect to be true. One day I spoke about it.

"How," I asked the mother-in-law, "were you sitting in her daintily ornate drawing-room drinking afternoon tea, 'how do you and your son's wife happen to agree so wonderfully?' You must have loved each other very much before he even thought of marrying her," I waited for an answer.

The mother-in-law stirred hesitantly, reflectively before she spoke. Then suddenly she put down her teacup and folded her hands in her lap, as she always does when she wants to talk about something near her heart. "I never knew her before James married her," she told me rather abruptly. "Her son was very far from mine, and we never met until the day of the wedding. She was in her bride's dress when I arrived and as I walked in, tired from my journey and frankly resentful of the girl who was going to be my son's wife, she came up to me and put her arms around my neck and said: 'Mother—his mother. And I put my arms around her neck just as if I had known her always and I said, 'Yes, dear, and yours too.' You see, we began right."

"Oftentimes since then I have wished that I were the only woman in my son's life—and he's been married some years. But every time I feel the jealousy in my heart I think of the way she greeted me there, and I say to myself, 'Polish woman, you love your son and she loves him. She's the mother of his children just as you were his mother.' And somehow, when I say that, the jealousy fades away." She picked up her teacup again and I knew that she had finished talking.

Several weeks later I happened to go into town on the same train with the daughter-in-law, and it occurred to me that I should like to know her side of the story. I wondered whether she too had ever felt the flicker of jealousy that every daughter-in-law is apt to feel. "Did you and your mother-in-law always love each other so much?" I asked.

The daughter-in-law laughed—slow, merry laugh that was one of her characteristics. "I loved her from the moment I saw her," she said, "and that was the day I married James. But I know what you mean; you want to know if I've ever been jealous of her? Well, I have. It began when we started housekeeping."

"I had never done my own work and I wasn't as clever about those things as some girls are. My mother-in-law had always been a perfect housekeeper and oftentimes, when the biscuits were heavy or there was dust on the boiler or iron-rust on the tablecloth, it annoyed me unspeakably to have James mention his mother. I felt that he was comparing me with her. I remember one day I had hysterics over it—after he had gone to work."

"Then little Jimmy was born, and when I held him in my arms all the jealousy was swept out of my heart. I realized what it was to have a son and I shuddered at the awful thought of his ever marrying. I wondered how my mother-in-law could have loved me at all when I took her place in her son's life. I realized that she had felt about him as I felt about my own boy."

Oh, mothers-in-law and daughter-in-law, be tolerant with each other. Remember, if you are a mother-in-law, that your son's wife is the mother of his children, and remember if you are a daughter-in-law that your husband's mother once held him in her arms, and that baby with dependent hands, and that he will always be her baby.

The Lord loveth the rich man who is a cheerful giver, and also loveth the poor man who cannot give but is cheerful anyhow.

Young People's Topics for September 26

Shields Against Temptations

Christian Endeavor Topic. Eph. 6:10-18

WHAT makes people do wrong? That is almost the most interesting question in the world. What makes me do wrong? That is certainly the most important question for me. For if I can find the answer to that, I can find an answer to the question how to be kept from doing wrong.

Practically every wrong is committed because a person loves himself more than he loves others. We might say that this is true in every case, but there are some perplexing instances in which a man seems to do a great wrong for the sake of a great love—as when a poor man robs his employer for the sake of his health or perhaps the life of wife or child. But a soul analyst might say that wrong is still selfish, for the wrong-doer is choosing to help some one for whom he cares greatly at the expense of some one for whom he does not care enough.

But we know that back of the whole world of sin, its injustices, its greed, its strife, there lies the fundamental cause—selfishness. Love of self—that is what makes us sin. So the safeguard against sin is love. A man who loves others will not wrong them, will not hurt them, will not take risks with their physical, mental, or physical welfare. The way to be temptation-proof is to be filled with love.

How do we get this kind of a heart? First, how can the heart have been filled with this kind of sin-preventive? Christ will give it to us. That is his business—to change hearts, taking out the self-love and putting in its place love for others, in whose needs we recognize an opportunity of serving and pleasing the divine Friend who has won our heart's deepest affection.

ican Baptist Publication Society, cares for unchurched territory in America, organizes and builds new churches and helps overburdened congregations. A catechism of seventeen questions has been prepared for this lesson, and if the leader or the Missionary Committee will write to the state secretary he will provide material for their answers. Their discussion will insure an interesting meeting.

lar of his true being when he permits himself to destroy his co-laborers in the eternal struggle against nature and evil. Only by co-operation has man advanced from the half-starved savage to the command of all climes and countries for the furnishing of his breakfast table and the spiritual enrichment of all life. Had it not been for the world's innumerable wars destroying untold numbers of mute, inglorious Edisons, Pasteurs and Adam Smiths, countless Gutenbergs, Darwins, Nelsons and Washingtons, man's united struggle against environment might have practically abolished disease, and crime.

Those who put their faith in explosives to secure justice, assume that patriots are bloodless, flabby and afraid to fight because they "lack physical courage." They logically put Benjamin Franklin, Kant, Victor Hugo, Goethe, Bright and Charles Sumner in the category of anemic invalids. The red-blooded opponent of their strategy who is toiling night and day to read clear ideas proudly declares,

"I was ever a fighter," but believes in struggle that is constructive and not futile; he craves the everlasting struggle, shoulder to shoulder with all men as comrades in a merciless warfare on the common, deadly dangers that will always threaten mankind. He knows that war is no more inevitable than slavery.

The Quiet Hour A Working Secret

SERVICE that counts is not something that we do, rather it is something that someone else does with us. We are living tools that God wants to use. A native pastor in Korea wrote to a friend in America: "I have been so greatly blessed. Not that I have done anything. The beloved Carpenter of Nazareth hath stretched forth his beautiful hand, and taken hold of me as a plane to work on his building. My only honor is that His hand hath touched me." In the same spirit Paul cried, "Yet not I, but the grace of God." Let us as tools ever glory in the pierced hand that lifts us and uses us. Failure comes when we think, "I am laboring abundantly." Yielding to the Master's hand is the secret of perfect workmanship.

Obedience and Kingship

International Sunday School Lesson for September 26
Read Psalm 72

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By REV. F. B. MEYER, D.D.

"The king shall joy in thy strength, O Jehovah; and in thy salvation how great shall he rejoice!" Ps. 21: 1.

We may surely turn this verse around, or read it backward. Our God does two things for us. First, he saves us from the penalty of sin and from the love and power of it. Second, he becomes our strength. His Spirit lives in us, as a fountain rising from unknown depths and flashing in the sunny air. We may truly say as they did in the wilderness: "Spring up, O well!" that is, "O God, be stronger and stronger in my soul, make more room for thyself, work more mightily in me; help me to yield to thee more utterly and permanently." As we cleave thus closer and closer to God's indwelling Spirit, three things happen. (1) We get saved deeper down and strengthened higher up. (2) We know an ever increasing joy, because we are tuned with the infinite Spirit of love and the harmony is the new song of paradise. (3) We become royal, who joys in God's strength is not only profoundly happy, but becomes king. The king shall joy in God, and he who joys in God is a king. There are many kings walking our world cognate. Beneath the threadbare old dress you may often find royal robes

Six to Two

By Arthur H. Howland

THERE is one straight road, one happy goal. Call the road Duty, and the end Success.

Our lessons for the quarter tell the life story of eight people: Absalom, Solomon, Rehoboam, Jeroboam, Asa, Ahab, Jezebel, Elijah. We need to run over into the fourth quarter a little to get to the end of three of these, but enough is told of them in this quarter's lessons to assure us what that end will be.

How many of these eight kept on the straight, upward road and reached the goal? Only two: Asa and Elijah.

Six failures to two successes! That is about the way it goes, or even worse than that. Can't the members of our class, our school, make up their minds that we will break that record, that we will spoil that rule? Let's all reach the end of the straight, plain road and find those fields we may truly call Success—not success in business, but success in being good and true and in helping others to be good. We can do it if we will. There is no need or no excuse for going astray; still less excuse than these six wanderers had, because they had never heard of Jesus, nor known the splendid power of his salvation and his friendship.

Jezebel fell farthest. There is nothing to indicate that she ever even started right. She was greedy, tricky, doubtless lustful. She hated God and hated his prophet. She refused warnings. She consorted with those who taught and practiced false and impure religions, and her horrible end is told in one of the chapters of next quarter's lessons.

Ahab had some gleams of good intentions. In his encounter with Ben-hadad he had Jehovah's help. He seems to have had a wistful idea that he would like to be good. But when he had to choose between holy Elijah and wicked Jezebel, he chose wrong. Greed, weakness, and evil companionship wrecked Ahab.

Absalom, as we found in a former study, failed because of impatience, anger, vanity, ambition, covetousness, insincerity, hypocrisy.

Jeroboam failed through ambition and through the notion that he could compromise with God's requirements.

Rehoboam failed because of evil companions, injustice, cruelty, and a desire for luxury and power.

Solomon came near to success. In fact, in some of his writings he achieved success. He left behind him many true, worthy, helpful words. But though he began so well and did some abiding good, his own life ended in disaster. Evil companionships and lust were his undoing.

Asa made some unintentional missteps, but came back to the main road and reached the end.

Elijah, though at times discouraged, never swerved from what he believed to be right, and his life had a glorious close.

There is a fine picture—if we can forget for a moment the six failures. Two sturdy men, a king and a prophet, withstanding the temptations of the court and of a nation bent on wrongdoing, compelling men, by the power of their examples, to do right and to seek God, brave in denouncing evil, walking with God, walking straight and ending gloriously.

We have it still in our power to decide which end shall be ours—up among the successes, with Asa and Elijah, or down among the failures, with Solomon, Rehoboam, Jeroboam, Absalom, Ahab and Jezebel!

Think frankly of the weakness of your nature. Think where you will be likely to fail, if you do fail. Take God's grace and God's power into your soul. Yield your life to him. Ask him to guide you. Trust him to keep you. Accept his offer to cleanse you, to give you a new heart, to put his spirit within you and cause you to walk in his statutes (Ezek. 36: 25-27). He is "able to keep you from falling and to present you faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy" (Jude 24).

In almost all the failures of these lessons we find the element of evil companionship. That choice comes to every one, and comes frequently—are we going to walk with God or to walk with some companion who will lead us away from God? No matter how sweet and strong the association, it does not pay to choose it instead of God. It ends down there among the failures. To walk with God is the only way to reach the right end.

But remember that to walk thus alone with God and to seek spiritual success does not mean that you are to plate yourself from others and have no interest in their welfare. The story of Pilgrim's Progress is very unsatisfactory here. The illustrations of the story, whether in book or on the lecture screen, emphasize this lack. It looks like a selfish proposition to see Christ and Faithful and Pilgrim forging ahead, fighting demons and running away from friends and home and work and all the dwellers in cities and towns, seeking a Celestial City. There is a saner and more Scriptural conception of the spiritual life. It is the life of arduous service for others—the life that not only seeks the goal, but gives its strength to helping others along to the same goal.

And that is the surest way to reach that high place of success. Make it your life ambition to help others find the right path, and you will stand on it yourself. Christian and his friends did well to turn from evil influences, but the story to be thoroughly normal and wholesome should tell of great concern for the welfare of others, of zeal in helping and saving them. Asa gave his life for others. Heavenly others. He taught others and provided for the teaching of multitudes now. His schools at Northfield and Crago, his influence in many forward movements, the Gospel light in many parts are monuments to his faithfulness. Travelers in England and Scotland meet at every hand indications that his

"Yes, the six months are up and our Holeproofs have outworn the guarantee."

Holeproof Hosiery

Warranted Against Tears, Drop-Stitches, Running Threads, or Any Manner of Hole.

Six pairs of lisle or cotton are warranted to wear six months without holes, three pairs of silk three months. If any pair fails in that time we give you new hose free.

Men's Holeproof Socks, 25c per pair and up. Women's and Children's Holeproof Stockings, 35c per pair and up.

Such perfect hose would be far more costly if our output were smaller. But we're making Holeproofs for millions, and large output cuts the factory cost per pair.

We import Japan's choicest silk. We procure the finest, longest cotton fibre grown in Egypt. We could pay half for lesser yarns. But then these hose would wear like common hose.

Ask your dealer for the genuine Holeproofs, or write for the names of Holeproof dealers in your town and book that tells how these hose are made.

influence abides. His work changed the religious life of Great Britain. He left his stamp upon the church in America. On his tombstone at Northfield are these words from John's epistle, words that point the way to eternal triumph for every one: "The world passeth away and the lust thereof, but he that doeth the will of God abideth forever."

By Rev. Franklin E. Hoskins, D.D.

BETWEEN Absalom and Ben-hadad lie about one hundred years of the human history of a small section of the great world. Eight individuals, Absalom, Solomon, a Queen of Sheba, Rehoboam, Jeroboam, Asa, Elijah, and Ben-hadad loom up from the remote past six kings, one queen and one prophet. The record of each life, preserved by divine providence, flashes backward through that century and forward through all centuries some rays of comfort and warning which this review would blend into the white shaft of Obedience to the Divine King.

Folly, wisdom, wealth, a desire for knowledge, wickedness, goodness, trust in God, the curse of drunkenness, are still living issues. The temple at Jerusalem has widened out beyond the mountain, to wherever men worship in spirit and in truth. The worship of Baal at Carmel has given place to the worship of Mammion everywhere. Men yet struggle against the still small voice, and failing to heed, break themselves against the granite truths given at Sinai. Moses and Elijah stand with the "greater than Solomon" on the Mount of Transfiguration, and the world halts at accepting the King of kings.

Psalms 72 may well have been written by David for the coronation of his son Solomon. Though never literally fulfilled for Solomon or any other king, it is still a prayer of God's people for every king, that his reign may be a reign of righteousness, peace, and prosperity; that his dominion and influence may know no bounds save those of the world itself; that he may be worthy to receive riches, honor, glory and might because he is a righteous savior of the poor and the afflicted. The world is burdened and weary, and can never be otherwise until He rules whose right it is to reign as King of kings and Lord of lords, Jesus Christ.

"The king and the king's son"—in strict accordance with Oriental usage, where the royal ancestry is always mentioned on coins, public monuments and the like.

The mountains and the hills are mentioned because they are the great characteristic features of Palestine.

Cornfields are seen everywhere on the slopes of Lebanon, even to the skyline, where they rustle like the cedars.

"His Name." The use of "the Name" is a mine of religious truth that has been only imperfectly worked thus far.

Great Floods in South China

MISSIONARY W. H. OLDFIELD, of Wuchow, China, writes under date of July 10th. "Kwangsi is again to drink the bitter dregs of suffering and famine. The rains continue to deluge the land, and the rivers rise higher and higher each passing hour. Fully three-fourths of the city of Wuchow is under water and the swift current makes escape by boat exceedingly dangerous. Several brick houses have collapsed, while the river front is literally strewn with wrecked buildings. The Wesleyan Mission compound stands almost alone amid a sea of water, while the hospital, chapel, and foreign residences have become an asylum for the destitute of that entire section. Thousands of people are homeless. For days an endless stream of debris has been floating down the Fu River. Many children, clinging to the wreckage of their homes, were rescued as they floated past Wuchow. Crops are ruined and heavy loss of life is feared."

Mr. R. S. Jaffray of Toronto, Can., a former missionary in China, writes to the Christian Herald: "From letters received I learn that whole cities—as for example Takking with a population of about 50,000, and Shungh with a population of perhaps 150,000 to 200,000—have been completely submerged in the flood, the roofs of houses being entirely under water, also that Wuchow was on July 10 three-fourths under water. About a month ago, Canton City was in darkness because of the floods having submerged the electric light plant, and Shamen, the foreign concession of Canton, was completely under water. The present floods will without question be followed by a famine of great severity."

A Week in the World's News

DR. SHELDON RETURNS TO THE MINISTRY. Editor The Christian Herald: I wish to express my deep satisfaction in the reading of two items in the Herald of August 25, one an editorial, "The Treasure Ship," protesting against the shipment of war munitions, the other "The War-Breeders," on the page of "The World's News." Both of these articles are Christian in tone and spirit. They voice the righteous indignation of Jesus. They are the truest utterances I have read in a long time. I am just beginning my church ministry again, after an absence of three years. If there is anything I long for it is to preach the Gospel of the Brotherhood. Your editorials and articles on the war wickedness are a positive contribution.

CHARLES M. SHELDON,
Central Congregational Church, Topeka, Kan.

KOREANS MUST BE JAPANNED BEFORE LEARNING CHRISTIANITY. In order that the youth of Korea shall become good Japanese citizens before anything else, new educational regulations have been enacted barring religion from the schools, complete elimination to be effected within ten years. The Christian schools conducted by American and other missionaries may eventually have to be abandoned as a result, according to Dr. J. E. Adams, executive secretary of six federated missions in Korea, and that will be a serious blow to both religion and education in that country.

NEBRASKA TO THE RESCUE. What seems like a magical lake in Sheridan county, Nebraska, promises to supplant Germany as the source of this country's supply of potash as a base for farm fertilizers, the lake's remarkable properties having been commercially exploited only since the war cut off the supply from Germany. The Boston Transcript states that the Nebraskan brand of potash is not mined by drilling and blasting, but is pumped up, in the form of heavily impregnated water and bottom mud, into great vats to be evaporated by artificial heat, leaving a residue of potash, alkali and other substances. The lake is 250 acres in extent and ten feet deep, but the mud that contains the potash solution goes down twenty to thirty feet in depth. When the lake dries up in summer, as it does, wells are dug into this mud and the water that oozes in is then pumped up for treatment. But although the operators had spent several years prior to the war in searching far and near for the basic deposit of potash from which the mud and water become charged with potash solution, no trace of a fixed bed of it was found. No other body of water anywhere about, nor the soil adjacent to the lake, contains traces of the mineral. Scientific curiosity quickly gave way to practical common sense, however, when the war shut off potash from abroad, and instead of trying to solve a problem in natural physics the owners of the property are concentrating their energies upon utilizing the valuable but mysterious potash deposit commercially.

A STATE FAIR OPEN ON SUNDAY TO A GOOD PURPOSE. The great stock pavilion on the Iowa state fair grounds, Des Moines, was turned over to the Iowa Sunday School Association on Sunday, August 29, and some 2,000 persons attended both Bible study and preaching services throughout the day. The pavilion was the "assembly room" of this unique Sunday school, and the classes distributed themselves through the various buildings of the exposition, the management of the fair having opened the grounds for this sole purpose. Eleven states were represented by Sunday school workers.

RECORD YEAR FOR INTERNAL REVENUE RECEIPTS. Despite a $42,000,000 falling off in the expected income tax for the fiscal year ending June 30, and the significant decrease in receipts from distilled spirits and fermented liquors of about $23,000,000, the internal revenue of the government exceeded by $35,000,000 the total of last year, the aggregate for 1915 being $415,000,000. The special war tax imposed October 23, 1914, yielded $52,069,000, as follows: liquors in general, $21,160,000; tobacco, $2,486,616 (about half the ordinary receipts); banking, etc., $4,967,179; documentary stamps, $20,494,475; perfumery, etc., $2,961,490. The income tax brought $39,144,000 from corporations, and $44,046,000 from individuals. The latter item disclosed the fact that in this country there are about 345 half-million dollar incomes and 41 of a million dollars or more each, no editor of a weekly illustrated newspaper for the family being found in either group. The war tax expires by limitation in December; as the government faces a monthly deficit of $15,000,000, either a bond issue or the re-enactment of the tax may be expected to take up this slack in receipts, enormous as they are in the aggregate.

NOTHING SUCCEEDS LIKE SUCCESS. The success of the submarine in the present war has stimulated even China into acquiring such craft for coast defense, a commission of expert naval men, including an admiral, being now in this country with authorization to contract with American firms for one hundred submersibles at a cost of about $750,000 each. The Fore River Shipbuilding Corporation, Quincy, Mass., has completed ten submarines for the British Government, to be delivered after the war. . . . The United States Government is about to place orders for sixteen under-sea boats, three of which are to have a cruising radius of 5,500 miles.

AN ALTRUISTIC ABSCONDER? The state of Yucatan, Mexico, is short some $300,000 which a late governor, one Argumendo, thoughtfully carried away with him to prevent its being stolen when he realized the uselessness of resisting the bandit governor whom Carranza had sent to supersede him in office, and fled. The secretary of state for Yucatan is seeking the help of United States courts to recover the money, most of which Argumendo states he expended for a steamer, ammunition and supplies, "all for the state," but seemingly to convey the balance, $100,000 or thereabouts, to Havana for safe keeping.

SERIES OF MUNITIONS PLANT EXPLOSIONS. On Sunday, August 29, two black-powder mills of the Du Pont Powder Company, Wilmington, Del., were completely wrecked by an explosion that uprooted trees, shook houses four miles distant, and hurled heavy machinery far and wide. Two workmen were killed, one being blown to atoms. On the same day, at Acton, Mass., the glazing mill of the American Powder Company blew up, the shock being felt forty miles away. No one was injured, the mill being closed over Sunday. Wednesday, September 1, an explosion occurred in the plant of the National Conduit and Cable Company, New York, where ammunition contracts are being filled, caused by a pot of molten metal falling into a puddle of water. Six men were injured; there are about 4,000 men employed there.

RUMORS PERSIST OF RETURN BY CHINA TO MONARCHY. The vice-president of the Chinese republic, Li Yuen Heng, is reported to have resigned his office, and to have requested permission to depart with his family to a private residence, assuring president Yuan Shi Kai that he would not oppose the project for the restoration of a monarchy, though he would not favor such a course. Professor Frank J. Goodnow, legal adviser of Yuan Shi Kai, is expected in America early in October. The Chinese press is said to devote much space to discussions of the proposed great backward step in China's political system. Yuan Shi Kai, at a recent cabinet meeting, bitterly deplored the ascendancy of Japan in the affairs of the republic.

QUITE A LITTLE FLEET TO START WITH. There would seem to be cause for rejoicing on the part of those who wish to see a great American mercantile marine, in the increase of ships in foreign trade now flying the Stars and Stripes. On June 30 there were 2,768 such vessels, an increase for the year of 363 over the preceding year. The gross tonnage of this merchant fleet is 1,813,775. The new registry law brought about by the war is responsible.

FIGHT TO UNIONIZE TEACHERS. The Chicago Board of Education has recently ordered the dissolution of the Chicago Teachers' Association (which is as near to being a labor union organization as teachers can get), declaring it an illegal association and ruling it out of the educational system of the city. The Association will appeal to the courts against this decision, and organized labor throughout the nation is said to be preparing to stand behind the teachers in their contest.

PIONEERING IN STATE CONSTITUTION REVISION. The lengthy session of the New York State Constitutional Convention is approaching adjournment after prodigious labor in considering the many more or less drastic revisions which have been proposed. One of the most important of the measures, namely the short ballot under which four state officers only will be elected—the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, Attorney General and Comptroller—was adopted September 2 by a vote of 124 to 30. A proposal to simplify court procedure and lessen the cost to litigants, was adopted, and also municipal and county Home Rule proposals. These and many other articles for the new constitution were advanced to their third reading and a vote after full debate. Eventually, the final recommendations of the Convention will be submitted to the voters of the state.

AS THE TWIG IS BENT THE TREE'S INCLINED. "The standing army (of 1,000,000) should consist of boys. . . . The boys are those who make the real fighters. . . . Every year there are 800,000 boys who reach the age of 18 years in this country. . . . the government must . . . equip them . . . to make the United States formidable. . . ." These are extracts from a speech Colonel Robert M. Thompson delivered after being elected president of the Navy League. The sentiments are in line with suggestions that are being made that military training should be introduced into the public schools. "The first requirement in education of childhood and youth throughout the world is such a revision of the definition of patriotism . . . as will lift the sentiment out of racial, national and territorial boundaries into . . . the sense of international relationship." That was said by Mrs. Wright Sewall at the annual congress of the National Education Association, August 28. And Mrs. Fannie Fern Andrews declared: "The task set before us is to bring about a complete change of feeling in the world, a correction of ideas, of which should come a world repudiation of war." Will you send your boy to school to Colonel Thompson or to Mrs. Andrews?

WILL SPLIT A LANCE OR TWO FOR A GOOD CAUSE. The Associated College Newspaper Publishers at their recent annual convention adopted a new rule barring liquor advertising of all kinds from the columns of the forty-nine leading college newspapers represented in the association, expulsion from the organization to follow upon a violation. Several important college papers already bar all such advertising. Many of these college papers are dailies, and a considerable circulation. The association also decided to reach out after general advertising, instead of depending solely upon local business. In both undertakings these journals serve success.

ADMINISTRATION PROGRAM FOR NATIONAL DEFENSE. The press of September 3 gives in full executive letters from President Wilson to the Secretary of the Navy and Secretary of War under date of July 21, lining upon them to obtain the cooperation of the best equipped minds of the country for the formation of a policy for increased national defense to be submitted to Congress at its next session, a program including the wish for "a proper training of citizens to arms." Both these departments are now actively engaged in preparing the strongest possible facts and arguments in support of the movement for a greatly increased army and navy, for the consideration of Congress.

THE F-4 A SAD OBJECT LESSON. On August 30 the submarine F-4, which sank in Honolulu harbor March 25, was raised to a depth of 300 feet, a most difficult operation conducted by naval officers with specially constructed apparatus, consisting in part of great winches mounted on mud-scoops, and cables that were lowered and slung under the wrecked craft. The weight lifted was about 250 tons. The submarine, badly damaged and partly filled with mud, was placed in dry-dock and pumped out. Four bodies were found and fragments of others; only one could be identified, that of George H. Ashcroft of Los Angeles, a gunner's mate. The cause of the fatal accident had not been determined to September 3, but the preliminary investigation disclosed that all our submarines of the F-4 class are defective and unsafe, and probably other classes will bear looking into also.

DARING AERIAL ADVENTURE KILLED. Adolphe Pégoud, most famous of French aviators, is reported killed, but has not been stated in early despatches. Pégoud originated the aerial loop-the-loop and upside down flying and amazed the world by his feats. He distinguished himself in the present war also, being killed with several remarkable exploits, one of which was the bringing down of a German taube containing a pilot and a gunner, within the reach of lines; another was a mid-air duel in which his machine was wrecked, Pégoud falling to earth and pretending death until his German opponent neared him, when he shot the latter and landed in the German's machine. The dead aviator was thirty-two years old.

The Cost of War

THE people of Europe are wasting untold life and wealth in their present struggle, yet we Americans congratulate ourselves daily that we are on this side of the ocean and not called upon to bear the staggering cost of war. We are very fortunate, but not all of us realize that even we are carrying upon our shoulders a tremendous war burden.

What does war cost us? During the one hundred and thirty-eight years of our independence we have spent about twelve years in war, or about nine per cent. of the time. But the money we have spent for war during that time has not been nine per cent. of our expenditure. It has been about eighty per cent. of it. For some years we have enjoyed perfect peace, but our war expenses have continued—have increased, have been quadrupled in the last twenty years. During the past year, in a time of peace, we have spent $478,000,000 for war purposes, army, navy, pensions and interest on the national debt, which is entirely a war debt. This war expense constitutes seventy per cent. of all the money spent by the government; while only the other thirty per cent. pays the bills for all civil purposes, including rivers, harbors, Panama Canal, agriculture, Congress, the executive and the judiciary.

In two years we have spent nearly a billion dollars for war purposes. How much is a billion dollars? . . . We all know what a dollar bill is: a billion of them would make a pack fifty-five miles high. In the last two and a half years we have spent for war a dollar for every minute which has passed since the birth of Christ. Our army is but fourteen per cent. the size of the French army, yet costs us more than twice as much. It is but thirteen per cent. as large as the German army and costs over half as much. It is but seven per cent. as large as the army of Russia and costs thirty-seven per cent. as much. Our army costs us $1,300 per capita, while no European country pays as much as $400. Naval figures reach almost the same proportions.

We look with considerable wonder and admiration upon the great guns which protect New York harbor. Our wonder does not cease when we know that the cost of firing one of these guns is $1,600 to $1,800, as much as a laborer can earn in two or more years.

Now it is interesting to notice what could be accomplished with our war money if it were turned into constructive channels. Let us apply it to education. Estimating the cost of the average university at two and one-half millions, our annual war expenses would build and equip four universities in every state of the Union. The very best two-room modern rural school can be built for $1,000. Our annual war bill applied to this purpose would build 2,500 such schools in every state of the Union. If applied every year it would give every high-school student in the United States high-school education and the necessary books. It would also give a free college education to six times the number of people enrolled in our colleges. The price of one battleship would more than pay for all the school-books used in the United States in a year.

From the standpoint of the philanthropist, our yearly war budget would provide the following institutions for the betterment of humanity: ten hospitals at $200,000 each, two insane asylums at $500,000 each, four orphan asylums at $250,000 each, four blind schools at $250,000 each, four old people's homes at $250,000 each, two reform schools at $250,000 each, two schools for deaf-mutes at $250,000 each, four industrial training schools at $250,000 each, twenty agricultural high schools at $50,000 each, a model nursing every county of the United States at $2,000, one thousand nurses at $100 per month for the prevention of diseases, $50,000 for the relief of the poor, and another million dollars left for any other purpose.

Would what we spend for war every year furnish all these things? Yes, it would furnish all these things in every state of the Union. These are only some of the things we should do with the money we spend for WAR!

Have You Ammunition?

THE nations of Europe now at war are calling for more great guns and more destructive ammunition. A great gun is worth more than a regiment of men, and one high-explosive shell will out a company of men out of action.

Systematic Bible Study

By correspondence is the only way by which many Christians can get the great guns and the destructive shells for their warfare. The Moody Bible Institute of Chicago is now preparing eight courses of study that have been tested and proven worth while. The majority of these courses is Bible Study, the remaining courses being on methods of Christian work and allied subjects.

The Scofield Bible

Correspondence Course

Is now owned and controlled by the Moody Bible Institute, and is the most comprehensive course ever prepared for correspondence work. If you are within reach of the mails these courses are waiting for you. More than 3,000 students now taking them. 1,100 new students enrolled in the last term.

Cotton as Contraband

By CHARLES M. PEPPER

MAKING cotton contraband is a further reversion to the barbaric principles of war which have marked the present fearful conflict. It is a step backward, just as making foodstuffs meant for the consumption of the civilian population of a country at war contraband is a step backward. It is an assertion of the practice which both sets of belligerents have followed in the present war, of subjecting neutral commerce to their own convenience, regardless of the rights of neutrals. It is an effort to put the plea of national necessity above long-established international usage. Yet this does not mean that cotton may not be declared contraband without the actual violation of international law. It does mean that it sets back all that has been done by Hague Conferences and other international gatherings to soften the rigors of war.

It is necessary to understand, in the first place, what is meant by absolute contraband. In the intercourse of nations, this heretofore has been defined as all articles which ordinarily are used for war—such as guns and ammunition. Among the commodities which in past wars have been held to be non-contraband are foodstuffs and cotton. In the proclamations issued by the various belligerent powers at the beginning of the war they specified the articles which were contraband, and from time to time they have gone on enlarging this—regardless of previous practice. So foodstuffs first, and then raw cotton, have come to be considered as contraband.

The British position as to raw cotton not being contraband was stated by the British ambassador to St. Petersburg in 1904, during the Russo-Japanese war.

The British Government at that time had especially in mind the interests of her dependency, India.

Following the Hague Conferences, an effort was made by a conference of the powers at London to embody what were supposed to be the advanced principles governing modern warfare. The Declaration of London specified what was known as a free list, or non-contraband list of articles.

This non-contraband list included cotton and other raw material for the textile industries.

The justification for making cotton contraband, on the ground that it enters largely into explosives, and therefore is in reality a munition of war, does not bear close scrutiny. At least there has been no marked increase in its use for explosives since the protest of the British Government to Russia, when the quantity used for this purpose was declared to be small. The great bulk of raw cotton is used for industrial purposes—during war times as well as peace. It might also be noted that cotton, in the form of absorbents, is useful for medical purposes, and that in cutting it off, one means of succor to the wounded and suffering is restricted.

In the international view, the case is stronger for making cotton contraband by simply assuming that industrial starvation of an enemy is justifiable, just as starvation through shutting off foodstuffs is claimed to be justifiable.

The historic position of the United States was summed up by Secretary Hay in his note to the Russian Foreign Office at the time of the Russo-Japanese war. Among other things, Secretary Hay speaking as the mouthpiece of the government of the United States, said: "Articles which, like coal, cotton, and provisions, though ordinarily innocent, are capable of warlike use, are not subject to capture and confiscation unless shown by evidence to be actually destined for the military or naval forces of a belligerent."

It takes a very wide stretch of the imagination to assume that our great Southern cotton crop, or any considerable portion of it, can be actually destined for the military or naval forces of any of the European belligerents. The bulk of it is destined for their textile mills, as it always has been.

The energetic protests which President Wilson has caused the State Department to make from time to time against the practices of the belligerents in interfering with neutral commerce can properly be supplemented by further energetic remonstrances against the efforts to place the entire cotton crop at the control of one set of belligerents, though it may be within the strict letter of international law for either set of belligerents to declare cotton contraband.

On the other hand, suppose a strike directly through Rumania first and then through Bulgaria. In point of distance there would be a saving of perhaps thirty miles. The most difficult part of the route would be the crossing of the Transylvanian Alps, which are immediately south of the Austrian border, in Rumania; but these once crossed the route would be comparatively easy, though the Balkan range in Bulgaria would still have to be crossed; but this route is not so difficult to force a way through, or to hold once forced.

Turning to the possibility of South Russia and Odessa being the objective: In point of distance this objective is a little closer to the base of Eastern Galicia, from Galicia to Odessa being about 225 miles; and in addition the lines of communication of an invading army would be more easily guarded, since in an advance in that direction the River Dniester could be made to serve as an almost perfect defense of the left flank of the invading army.

The possession of Odessa and the other points on the Black Sea, which would naturally also come into possession of the invaders, would very largely, if not quite, offset any advantage which the Allies could gain by the forcing of the Dardanelles and the capture of Constantinople, and would probably render the Russian Black Sea fleet harmless.

Furthermore, the road to Odessa would have to be forced only against already defeated and discouraged troops, and not through fresh troops of two warlike nations, burning to distinguish themselves, as would either road to the other objective. Finally, the railroad facilities on this second road would be capable of being made greatly superior to those of the other routes leading to Turkey.

The land and sea campaign in the Dardanelles has been featureless this week. Reports from Turkish sources indicate that there has been hard land fighting at various points on Gallipoli Peninsula, and these reports advance claims to considerable gains, but of these there is no corroboration from British or French official sources; which sources have to all intents and purposes been absolutely silent as regards operations all the week.

The campaign in the West has been even more featureless this past week than for the many featureless preceding weeks. The combat on this battle line has degenerated into absolute trench fighting, without any results or changes of position of the slightest importance. During the week such activity as there was took place on the eastern end of the line in the Vosges mountains, and as far as this activity had any results they were favorable to the French.

IT SLUGS HARD

Coffee a Sure and Powerful Bruiser

"Let your coffee slave be denied his cup at its appointed time! Headache, sick stomach, fatigue. I know it all in myself, and have seen it in others. Struggle that thinking, reasoning beings will resist in its use," says a Topeka man.

He says further that he did not begin drinking coffee until he was twenty years old, and that slowly it began to poison him, and affect his hearing through his nervous system.

"Finally, I quit coffee and the conditions slowly disappeared, but one old morning the smell of my wife's coffee was too much for me and I took a cup. I was drinking my regular allowance, tearing down brain and nerves by the daily dose of the nefarious beverage."

"Later, I found my breath coming hard, had frequent fits of nausea, and I was taken down with bilious fever."

"Common sense came to me and I quit coffee for good and went back to Postum. I at once began to gain and have had no returns of my bilious symptoms, headache, dizziness, or vertigo."

"I now have health, bright thoughts, and added weight, where before I was invalidism and the blues."

"My brother quit coffee because of its effect on his health and now uses Postum. He could not stand the nervous strain while using coffee, but keeps well on Postum." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Postum comes in two forms:

Postum Cereal—the original form—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—a soluble powder—dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water, and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 40c tins.

Both kinds are equally delicious and cost about the same per cup.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

AMARILLY OF CLOTHES-LINE ALLEY

If you need a tonic—and many do need one these trying days—let us make you acquainted with Amarilly Jenkins, the little maid of the slums, who came up "through Poverty Gap and received her education at the College of Hard Knocks," like many another daughter of the tenements. But Amarilly's unfailing good nature and sunny optimism make friends everywhere.

The story of Amarilly will begin in the October 6th issue of the Christian Herald, and having read it ourselves with abounding satisfaction, we know our readers will welcome it enthusiastically. She is such a dear little creature that no one can help loving her. Even if she tugs at our heart-strings at times, she soon has us laughing again.

We won't anticipate your pleasure by telling the story of Amarilly, or describing the varied adventures and experiences she went through, rising a step in the world at each successive stage, until she set her whole family on their feet. Amusing and pathetic by turns, she met all her difficulties bravely, and conquered in the end. You must read for yourself how she began her struggle for an education, took in a Boarder (with a capital B), made friends who helped her in the struggle for a living, built that wonderful edifice, the "Annex," for the Boarder and Lily Rose, helped her own folks to success through her cleverness in renting out the rector's extra surplus (she called it "surplus") and how she became the good angel of the whole Alley. She was a girl with an ideal and she worked bravely at it and won out, having lots of fun by the way. Her story will be a joy and inspiration to every one who reads it.

We predict that Amarilly will make as many friends among Christian Herald readers as Pollyanna, and we extend to each member of the Christian Herald Family a cordial invitation to give Amarilly as wide an audience as possible. You will be doing your neighbors and friends a favor by letting them know that Amarilly will make her bow to the Family Circle in the Christian Herald for October 6th.

Be sure to renew your subscription at once so as not to miss any installment of Amarilly.

TIMKEN

AXLES & BEARINGS

Look at the bushing "B" in the picture. The pin is keyed into the steering knuckle in which this bushing is pressed. There's no turning of the pin in bushing "B." Then why have a bushing at all? To make a tight fit so there'll be no pound from the constant vibration. Not one little point like this is overlooked in Timken-Detroit design.

Note the bushings in the cross-rod yoke (C and D). Due to spread of yoke the pressure is kept low and when wear comes here it must come on hardened pin and bushings that are replaceable at low cost. They, too, are accurate and interchangeable.

Axles That Never Wear Out

MOVING parts of axles, like moving parts of anything, will wear in time. There is no exception to this rule, but—

In the Timken-Detroit Front Axle the moving parts—every one of them—are either Timken Roller Bearings or hardened and ground steel bushings or pins.

These bearings, bushings and pins wear very slowly. Timken Bearings are adjustable to take up the slight wear and Timken-Detroit Bushings and Pins are easily replaceable when worn sufficiently.

So the axle may truly be said to never wear out.

Take the front axle spindle. No wear comes on it because nothing moves on it. Slight wear does come on the cones, cups and rollers of the two bearings. These are Timken Tapered Roller Bearings that offer greatest resistance to wear and are adjustable to offset the effects of wear when it comes.

The same thing is true of the steering knuckle pin. At the top, to sustain the great weight, is a Timken Bearing. Below, where pressure is less but where there is some motion, there's a hardened steel bushing. It is made of good steel, is heat-treated, hardened and ground to size so it wears very slowly.

And when it does wear it can be replaced easily, quickly and cheaply. Because Timken Bushings are accurate to the thousandth part of an inch, they are interchangeable. A new one will fit without any tinkering.

Of course Timken-Detroit Axles are strong enough, and to spare, for the loads they are designed to carry. And for the emergencies of motor-truck and pleasure car service. They are standing up under thousands of commercial and pleasure cars made by the leading builders.

When every other part of those cars is worn out, new pins, new bushings, perhaps a new bearing here and there will fit them for another lifetime of service under another car.

A 72-page booklet No. D-5, "The Anatomy of Automobile Axles" tells the story of the axle in an interesting, human way. A 32-page booklet No. D-6, "The Care and Character of Bearings" gives clear, non-technical information of great value to the car owner. These, with the list of "The Companies Timken Keeps" will be mailed free on request for the three booklets to either Timken Company. Only the booklets will be sent, no letters, no salesman.

Pete McCarthy's Back Room

PETE McCARTHY was not a youth, but full of energy and seemed to demand incessant exercise. He was a drinker and a boxer, tended bar, trained prize-fighter and settled his own personal grievances. He was never vicious, but he was a "scrapper."

Sitting upon the porch of his little shop in Joliet, Ill., one day, he observed a new and somewhat delicately constructed minister coming up the street. The newcomer was moving into the Methodist parsonage next door to Peter's place. Watching for a head lift at the auspicious moment, Peter waited over.

"Say, partner," he began by way of introducing himself, "if there's any hard lifting, I am ready for an day job. As you are to become a neighbor, it won't cost you a cent."

Peter's offer was kindly refused. "I have only a little stuff," said the young minister, "but I hope for a better acquaintance."

Here was the turning-point for Peter. They became good neighbors. Peter sat through the services next Sunday near the door. Inching along from seat to seat, Sunday by Sunday, in few weeks he sat near the pulpit. He soon became a co-worker in the activities of the church. "There," said the pastor to his wife, "I told you that I would get him; I just knew it. I saw he'd a heart in him."

Peter was not satisfied to be a mere listener. He felt that he must do something for somebody else. One man who knew of Peter's beginnings in Christian work gave this characteristic description of it:

"Pete McCarthy, the old prize-fighter—say, there's a fellow that got it right. You know I ain't much on preachers myself, but Pete has the goods. He's out nights, leading on those fellows that are stewed, in them Testaments, a square meal and clothes. Why, he leaves his working chair and talks to farmers in their wagons. He knows 'em and dries 'em right home; gets them down on their knees in the back room of his shop and he means every word of it. The fellows who are up against it under and he is on the square. He took his own shoes off to give them to a bun and made him a good citizen."

The back room grew into a million. Every morning, on his knees, Peter asked the Lord to give him a soul that day. After his day's work in the barber shop was completed, he would stay at the First National Bank corner watching till midnight, sometimes later. Experience has given him a knowledge of the street possessed by skilled detectives. Peter knows a man of sorrow, a soul seeking companionship, a lonely adrift. He talks their language. He reasons as a neighbor and a low traveler. With his protégé in hand it is a walk to the mission of a mile and a half, under the smokestacks of the steel mills. At the mission he finds his man a supper if hungry, a coat if homeless, clothing if he be ragged, and a job. Occasionally somebody asks Peter his authority for all this work, and he refers them to John 15:16.

HIS SHIP O' DREAMS © By LOUISE AYRES GARNETT

DAVID came when his father and mother had given up expecting him. After years of childlessness his coming was the miracle of joy.

Anne had no cut-and-dried principles of child-rearing. She thought that never failing love and unobtrusive watchfulness could meet any situation. In her tender heart were many unspoken beliefs. One as that grateful feeling and prayerful wishes were never lost, and it was an integral part of her day'sosaic to send heaven-lifted thoughts for David.

Another belief was that a child's last waking moments should be full of peace; that he should drift to the country of dreams with his mind and heart happy and undisturbed. The prophetic mother-eyes resaw the time when David would need to look back on the serenity of hours that could never fail him, that could be endlessly drawn upon for strength. Consequently every night when his bedtime came, his prayer had been said and his warm little body tenderly tucked in, he murmured, "Sing"; and Anne sang the hymns that had lodged in the reverent nooks of her own spirit, together with a secular sprinkling of tender child-tunes. Usually she began with

When He cometh, when he cometh,
To make up his jewels;

and ending thence to "Bye, Baby Bunting"; then on to Nearer, My God, to Thee"; and as many more as his sleepy eyes would permit. As he grew older it was understood that little misdemeanors were forgotten at that time. Nothing but peace was allowed to possession.

James, who had been as glorified as Anne by David's coming, felt that discipline, always firm, and harsh if necessary, was the only method productive of sound reason.

In the boy's early years the difference in the parental points of view led to no serious complications. James saw little of him except on Sunday, what was called Father's Day, and David, tractable and happy, caused no opportunity for stern governance. He was nine years old when James awoke to the fact that he did not approve of Anne's methods. It was on a winter night, when all warmth had to come from within, that the slumbering disciplinarianism of James's nature sprang to life.

"Mother," he called up the narrow stairway, "what are you doing?"

"Singing to David, dear," answered Anne. "I'll be down in a minute."

"Don't sing another note," said James harshly.

Anne was filled with wonder and in a few minutes joined him in the lamp-lighted sitting-room.

"Why did you ask me not to sing?" she inquired. "I've done it ever since David was a baby."

"Yes, and he always will be a baby as long as you continue it." James felt the force of his argument and bit his jaws. "You are coddling him past remedy. A son of mine must be taught to be a man."

"I don't coddle him," defended Anne; "at least only at night time. After he gets into bed he calls me. I do sing to him then because I believe in it."

"What good can it do?" half sneered James. "Come, Anne, what is it you believe in?"

Brought to bay, Anne, not quick of speech, felt at disadvantage. Her high altars, white and candle-lighted, could not be reduced to speech. She groped for expression. Her words came stumbingly.

"It makes us better friends. It's a kind of bond. When he's grown, and away from us, it's going to be a safeguard."

"I never had any one sing to me," objected James. "When I was David's age I was made to look after myself."

"Yes, so was I," said Anne, with a wistful look of memory in her eyes. "I've always missed something—maybe it's this very thing I've missed, and can never get."

"Nonsense!" said James with decision. "The world is turning soft with women's sentiment."

"The last thing he says as he cuddles down is Sing," pleaded Anne. "Just that one word—Sing."

Her voice sounded hurt.

"There, there, Anne!" said James awkwardly. "I know your intentions are all right; it's your judgment that's bad. When you speak about your singing being a safeguard to the lad when he is grown—why, it's just nonsense."

Anne bit her lip and was silent.

"If those are your only reasons, they won't pass muster," he added.

"But that's not all." Anne crimsoned, fighting desire for tears. "There's another reason. It's my way of thanking God for the child we had given up expecting. I'm glad I am happy, and a song seems to me one of the best ways of praying and praising."

"I don't like such things discussed," he said, unasily. "They're not intended to be spoken."

"I've never done it before," she answered. "Tonight I have to let you know how I feel—that it's my heart that sings. Why, James, David's bedtime is the crown of the day for me! I think of it when I get up in the morning, and when I lie down at night."

With her confession she fled from the room and left James frowning at the floor.

AFTER that Anne's way was not an easy one, nor was the path that David's young feet trod as smooth as childish paths should be. James continued to object to what he called Anne's sentimental ways, and while honestly trying to correct conditions he

REMEMBER

By NELSON GARDNER

Our lips renounce both Mars and Thor,

But oft are words but idle breath,

And still our hearts incline to war,

And still we worship gods of death;

Forgetting, in destructive strife,

The healing Light that giveth life.

Yet not a comet, but a star,

Proclaimed the coming of the Lord,

Whose erring flocks have joined afar

The fierce disciples of the sword.

They slay, yet deem they follow still felt were menacing to the lad's future, he not only made her unhappy but raised a barrier between himself and David. She did her best to have the father's motives understood, but the child saw harshness only, the heavy hand that seemed to govern merely for the lust of governing. James was unable to see life from another's view point; and though he did not actually forbid the songs that so happily tapered off Anne's day, and so gently fanned the white sails of David's ship o' dreams, the mother and the boy felt the hand of criticism turned against them.

The King whose hosts curse not, nor kill.

As David grew in years James considered it his duty to grow in severity, and though he yearned to be loved as Anne was loved, he refused her advice to be a comrade as well as a father, and drifted farther from his son. David, on his part, resentful of what he felt was unjust rigor, grew headstrong, even bitter. Anne bravely tried to bring them together in peaceful understanding, but each day saw the sacrifice of her spirit.

One morning Anne's world almost came to an end. David, her bonny David, sixteen years old, big-framed like his father, bright-smiled like his mother; David, the warmth, the light, the beauty of her days, rebelled against a command of his father's and ran away from home, leaving his parents groping after him, and toward each other, across an abyss.

After all, it was James whose grief was greater as the months passed. Anne was not beset by futile repining, by tardy recognition of neglected opportunities. She had loved and watched, and now it was her right to weep and hope. But James had to face complexities that wrung him and would not be silenced. Anne, in the simplicity that divines, glimpsed much of this, and they learned again to walk hand in hand.

"He will come back to us," said Anne.

"He must come back," said James.

Two years passed before they had news of him. Then they learned that he had become a volunteer in the Philippine service, but nothing definite as to his regiment or whereabouts.

A week later they read of a hospital ship that had left Manila, and had landed at San Francisco with its load of sick and wounded. They saw the name: David Seldon.

"The train leaves in an hour," said Anne; and she and James were at the station long before the train was due.

That journey, which extended from the Maine coast to California, was made almost in silence.

Once James said, "Anne, what makes your face look so happy?"

And she answered, "I was thinking of the boy. I was making believe he was little again and that I was holding his warm, plump body next to mine. And I was letting him take out my hairpins and pretending to be vexed. Memories are such blessed, heartening things."

"Some memories are," said James. "I haven't many that I can hold."

Another time James asked,

"What is there I can do?"

And Anne answered timidly, "You might say a prayer, dear."

That is how James learned to pray.

It was on a morning golden with sunshine and heaped high with promise that they reached San Francisco.

"We cannot have any but happy news today," said Anne, her soul expanding bounteously at the thought of being near her boy. "This is not a cruel world."

When they reached the hospital it was Anne who found the doctor, and asked the questions concerning David, upon whose answers her spirit and that of James trembled in agony.

"Is he alive?" she asked.

"Yes," was the reply, slowly given.

Anne clutched James's rigid fingers. She moistened her lips. She made a mighty effort.

"Doctor, will he live?"

The doctor shook his head compassionately.

"I don't see how it is possible. He's had a nasty fever, and that and complications have reduced him literally to skin and bones. He can't rest. He hasn't slept for ten days and nights."

There was a silence. James and Anne both wished to say something, but the words wouldn't come.

The nurse led them to the door of the ward where David lay. Before they entered she said,

"Poor lad! we've done all we can for him. You see he hasn't been able to rest. Sleep would have been his salvation."

"Would have been?" faltered Anne.

"Yes," answered the nurse. "I'm afraid nothing but sleep could help him now, and it will not come."

She led them across the threshold to the bed. There lay their big-framed, bright-smiled boy, now a wasted wraith with gray eyes pitifully open and unseeing.

"David," said James. But no look of understanding answered him.

"He doesn't know me, mother," sobbed James. "You go to him." And he stepped back.

Anne, whose spirit had embraced her boy long before she reached him, knelt by his bed just as in the old days, and took his hand; and David, as if his soul had been called back from the vision on the borderland, spoke for the first time in many days, spoke with a feeble tongue and between lips parched and white, and he said but one word: "Sing."

Then did Anne, brave and sweet, softly lift up her voice to God and her boy and sing:

When He cometh, when He cometh
To make up His jewels.

And when she had crooned "Bye, Baby Bunting," and had wandered on to the hymn that says:

Still all my song shall be,
Nearer, my God, to Thee,

David's eyes had closed; he had set sail again in his ship o' dreams.

The nurse, her face alight with gladness, whispered, "I believe this sleep will save him."

And Anne said solemnly, "I know it will."

But James said not a word. He was praying.

CHARACTER in a MOTOR CAR for the FIRST TIME at a $1000 PRICE

CHARACTER in line, in finish, in quality of materials and workmanship, in engineering design and mechanical excellence—the same character for which discriminating motor car owners paid $2,000 to $5,000 but a short time ago—can now be possessed at the moderate cost of $1,000.

The man or woman who paid a high price for automobile satisfaction three years ago—and was then taxed a heavy toll for gasoline, oil and tires—now turns to the light weight, efficient, modern type of motor car. And among those who distinguish between ostentation and good taste a vast number are today recognizing, in this class, the pre-eminence of the Jeffery Four.

The Jeffery Four will be remembered as the car which introduced the high-speed, high-efficiency European type of motor into this country two years ago last January. The superiority of this type of motor was demonstrated so definitely—its efficiency and smoothness were so marked—that other manufacturers have adopted it as rapidly as they could change their plans to follow the Jeffery lead.

Now the Jeffery Company wishes to announce the new Jeffery Four—with a new standard seven passenger Chesterfield body, divided front seats, adjustable driver's seat, extra length springs, two hundred pounds lighter than last year, at a thousand dollar price—a finer car in every respect than the original Jeffery Four which has given thousands of owners a new conception of motor car quality, dependability, style and efficiency.

An inspection of this car and a ride in it will bring home to you the great strides taken recently in the art of building motor cars.

The World's Most Coveted City

Why the Ottoman Capital Is a Pivotal Point in the War, with a Review of Past Historic Contests to Possess this Key to Untold Commercial Wealth

CONSTANTINOPLE, the sacred city of the two seas, the prize for which many nations have fought at intervals during nearly thirty centuries, is once more the coveted object for which the naval and military powers of the world are locked in deadly strife. For many months past the Turkish capital has been defending itself in the water on the sea and on the land against forces more numerous and more powerful than any it has ever encountered before. The fleets and armies of France, Russia and Great Britain, reinforced by those of Italy, are contesting the supremacy of the Straits with their Turkish and German defenders, and when many thousands of brave men have fallen and many a gallant warship has gone to the bottom, the city itself sits grimly behind its walls of forts, unconquered and defiant.

Many predictions have been made as to the outcome of the struggle for the possession of Constantinople, but up to the second week of September the Crescent still waved above the harbor entrance, and the "Pearl of the Near East" remained in the hands of the Turks, who have held it through all the vicissitudes of four and half centuries.

It was in 1453 that the ancient city fell a prize to the Moslems. Founded 2,600 years ago by a colony of Megarians who claimed to have been directed by the oracle of Apollo in their choice of site, it has been held successively by Greeks, Persians, Macedonians and Romans, the latter making it the Eastern capital of their great empire. Probably no city has suffered more through war, earthquake, fire, pestilence and famine. Its commanding position, at the junction of two seas, uniting the ancient with the modern world, made it a market of the nation and from remote times it has been a center of military power and influence, and a seat of culture.

Before the Suez Canal was built, Constantinople was regarded as the key to Asia. Russia kept its ultimate conquest constantly in view, as a vital principle of national policy; but this ambition was thwarted time after time by the wiles of European diplomacy. The Crimean War, in which France and England fought side by side with Turkey against the Czar, was undertaken for the preservation of Turkey as a "buffer state," and to prevent Russia having free access to the Mediterranean. No history shows a complete reversal of the former situation. France and England are allied with Russia against the Turk, and the fulfillment of the dream of Peter the Great, which he is said to have outlined in his imperial testament, is now looked for with eager expectation by Russia as assuring the realization of her greatest hope, an open waterway to the Mediterranean.

Whatever way the struggle goes, the possession of Constantinople, one of the richest prizes any victor could covet, will carry with it unlimited advantages for commercial expansion. If it should fall to the Allies, it would assure the continued supremacy in the Mediterranean, the undisturbed control of the Suez Canal, and to England it would mean the command of the "road to India." Should Turkey triumph with the aid of the Central Powers, the result would go far toward assuring the ultimate success of Germany's great project for a through line of railway from Berlin to Bagdad, opening up a large part of the Orient to trade.

By the Mohammedan power won here in either event, political and religiously, is a problem that is being widely discussed. Abolitionists have contended that with the extension in the East of European trade and the methods of modern civilization, a complete transformation must soon be effected among the Mohammedans of Asia Minor, Syria and beyond. Already the plowshare of progress has made deep furrows in the ancient territory where Moslem faith and tradition are held most tenaciously, and where the ancient manners and customs are still everywhere in evidence. Whether this can survive a close and constant contact with European influences can only be decided by actual experience.

There is a little height at Galata, a suburb of Constantinople, where, according to a tradition of the early days when the city was known as Byzantium, Andrew the Apostle paid a visit. This was some time late in the first century A.D. With his own hands he is said to have made the form of a cross on the rugged face of the rock, as a sign that Christianity had been preached there. After a ministry of two years among the people, the apostle was driven away by the tyrant Zeuxippus, and took refuge on the Asiatic shore. There he continued his evangelistic work, founding churches and establishing congregations. At no time in its history can it be claimed that Constantinople has been a stronghold of Christianity. In its palmy days under Roman rule, it was half Christian and half pagan. It has always been a gathering-point of races and religions. Up to the outbreak of the present war, its population included besides Turks, Armenians, Bulgarians and a score of other nationalities, European and Asiatic, making it probably the most cosmopolitan city on the globe.

Fought Over for Centuries

AS Byzantium, as Constantinople, as Stamboul, the city on the Golden Horn has held captive the imagination of the world for more than twenty centuries. The meeting-place of East and West, the dream of emperors and the desire of conquerors, beautiful in its setting, gaining new beauties from each race and century, the city stands today the acknowledged queen among the cities of the earth.

In the year 326 A.D., when Constantine the Great chose the Greek city of Byzantium to be the capital of the Roman Empire and the first Christian city in the world, the Roman sovereignty had already been preceded by Persian, Macedonian, Gallic and Athenian control. Changing the name to Constantinople, the emperor planned to make it a city incomparable among the cities of the earth, surpassing even the city of the seven hills upon the Tiber. Here, too, were seven hills, and each was to be marked with a temple to the Christ or a monument to the emperor. The plans of Constantine were never fully carried out, yet enough was done to give the city a character which it has retained throughout all the vicissitudes of sixteen centuries of conflict, siege, capture and conflagration. The greatest work of Constantine was the Church of St. Sophia, now a Moslem mosque, yet so thoroughly Christian in the spirit of its planning that, in spite of all the changes that have been made to fit it for the worship of the prophet of Allah, it is still a mute testimony to the Saviour, whose mosaic representation in the vaulted ceiling of the dome broods above the worshippers.

Attacked in 450 A.D. by the Huns, the imperial city withstood all the armies and fleets sent against her by Huns, Russians and Persians until the eleventh century, when she was delivered by treachery to Alexius Comnenus. Again, in the thirteenth century, the Latin Crusaders entered and sacked the city. For two hundred years longer Constantinople defied her enemies; then, surrounded by the Turks, who had overrun all of Thrace, Bulgaria and Serbia, she surrendered to Mahomet II in 1453; and from being the object of invasion she became the seat of those fierce invasions of the plains of Transylvania and Hungary that finally brought the Turkish armies before the walls of Vienna in 1683. Here defeat drove the invaders back and from that time until the present the Turk has been driven, slowly and not without periods of fierce recovery, back toward the Bosphorus. Twice since Vienna a foe has stood without the walls, and yet, when the terms of peace were made, both Russia (1878) and Bulgaria (1912) were denied the city of their desire. Now again an enemy is at the gates; and as, in 1807, a British fleet forced the straits and appeared before the city, so in 1915 a British submarine has penetrated the harbor of the Golden Horn and has torpedoed the Galata Bridge. Will the city of Constantine once more bow to a conqueror?

The City Today

CONSTANTINOPLE is built on a promontory on the southern crescent of the Golden

Horn, which is a long inlet running from the Bosphorus into the hills of its western shore. To the northward the Bosphorus winds its narrow and treacherous course to the Black Sea. To the southward the Sea of Marmora stretches toward the Dardanelles, one hundred miles away. At the point of the promontory on the old Acropolis of the Greek city, the first of the seven hills of this new Rome, stands the great church-mosque of St. Sophia, rebuilt by the Emperor Justinian after the great fire of 538 A. D. at an expense of about $64,000,000, the most costly religious edifice in the world. On this hill stand also the Mosque of St. Irene, another of Constantine's churches, the Imperial Mint and the ruins of the Seraglio, a former palace of the Sultans. The second hill bears the Burnt Column of Constantine and the Mosque of Osman; the third hill the War Office, the Fire Tower and the Mosque of Suliman; the fourth, the great Mosque of Mahomet II, built on the site of Constantine's Church of the Holy Apostles; the fifth, the Mosque of Selim, which overlooks the Greek section of the city and the Greek Church of the Patriarchate; the sixth, the Palace of Hebdomon; and the seventh hill is crowned with the Fortress of the Seven Towers. The great wall of the city extends across the neck of the promontory from the seventh hill to the Golden Horn. Between the hills and up their sides are closely built stone and frame houses, each with its overhanging balcony and latticed windows and between them run the narrow crooked streets of the city.

In the valley between the second and the third hills stand the great khans or bazaars, massive stone buildings in which the traders' booths are grouped. Along the water front of the Golden Horn and of the Bosphorus, white marble residences and palaces glisten in the sunlight; and over every quarter of the city and on every hill-top rise the slender minarets that mark the Moslem's place of prayer. Outside the wall built by Constantine are three other walls, each with its moat and towers and fortresses. It is a city and a citadel well worth conquering. The Turk defends it, firm in the faith of Allah; yet one gate, the Golden Gate, in the great wall has been kept closed by royal order ever since the days of Mahomet II, for the Turk believes that through this gate some future Christian conqueror may enter the city.

The Byzantine Citadel Overlooking Sea of Marmora

OF the sufferings endured by the population of Constantinople during these months of incessant warfare, the outside world has had only occasional glimpses of information, chiefly through the letters of missionaries. There has been an exodus of American and some other missionary workers. The American Board announces withdrawals not only from Constantinople but from many points on both sides of the Straits, including Adabazar, Talas, Marsa, Smyrna, Sivas, Van, Tarsus, Tiflis, Diarbekir, and finding temporary refuge in Switzerland, others in Cairo, while a number have returned to the United States. Several of these devoted workers have died as the result of hardships and disease, including Mrs. Ussher and Miss Charlotte Ely, while a few are still seriously ill. United States Ambassador Morgan has secured protection for all the missionaries in Constantinople, and on August 4 word was received that they were personally safe, although all had been compelled to face severe trials. They describe the sufferings of the non-combatant population as most pitiful and beyond their power to relieve materially. Starvation and sickness were widely prevalent. An effort is being made under American auspices to send a commission to Turkey to investigate physical conditions among the people, and plan some practical methods of relief.

Throughout Eastern and Western and parts of central Turkey, nearly all of the Armenians,—men, women and children,—are taken from their homes and put under guard, to remote sections of the country inhabited by Moslems. Little preparation is made for the journey. Hardship and suffering among them are beyond description. Many executions of men have occurred in all of these places. The Greeks in Western Turkey are also great sufferers. While the ordinary missionary work in Turkey is in part halted, the every assurance not only that the work in the future will go on in full force, but that in many sections it will even enter upon a new and unprecedented era.

The Chain of Evidence

Of the Genuineness of the Gospels and the Epistles of the New Testament

VERY early in the Christian era, there came into existence a number of spurious so-called Gospels. These were altogether distinct from the Gospels, which have come down to us, with the abundant testimony of the early Church as to their genuineness.

In the opening verse of Luke's Gospel, and in the closing verse of that of John, there are intimations of a knowledge of the existence of those spurious Gospels. Paul, the authenticity of whose writings is well established, makes several references to "other gospels" which were in existence in his day. (See I Tim. 6:20 and I Tim. 1:4.) It was the task of the early Church to sift out from the mass of literature of the second and third centuries all that could not be satisfactorily authenticated, or that was not in strict accord with the teachings of Christ. Thus the great majority of the unauthenticated writings gradually passed out of existence. They could not stand the test of rigid examination, and even the very memory of many of them has been lost. The few that survive are mainly Gnostic.

Gnosticism was a strange mingling of religious beliefs, the result of the effort to combine several religions into a single system. The Gnostic writings were marked by allegory and mysticism. Some were exclusively heathen in origin, while others were combined with alien religions—pantheism, monotheism and paganism. They were replete with legend and fable, ingenious fabrications of a character which compelled their rejection as utterly unauthentic and even pernicious.

With the four true Gospels the case was altogether different. Composed during the latter half of the first century, they stand upon a basis of indisputable evidence. Before the second century closed, they were united as one collection and were in general use in the early Christian Church. Irenæus (who died about A.D. 202) wrote that their authority was so confirmed that even the worst enemies of the Christian religion were compelled to admit their genuineness. Tertullian (about A.D. 208) names them as the personal work of the apostles and their disciples, and as being indisputably of apostolic origin. Origen (A.D. 185-253) calls them the four elements of the Church's faith, of which the "whole world reconciled to God in Christ" is composed. Theophilus, Bishop of Antioch (A.D. 168), testifies to their genuineness, and Jerome relates that Theophilus arranged the writings of the four evangelists into a single work. Tatian (who died in A.D. 170) was the author of the first "Harmony of the Gospels." Justin Martyr (born A.D. 99) in his writings makes a number of quotations from the four evangelists, credited to their proper sources. Many similar incidents might be cited to show that among the leading Christian theologians of that early time the Gospels were accepted as the religious standard, and were well known and in general use.

One of the strongest and most convincing sources of confirmation of the genuineness of the Gospels, and incidentally of the Epistles also, has been found in the archeological discoveries of the last half-century. Some of the more important of these discoveries are described in an address by the Rev. Parke P. Flournoy, D.D., of England, before the Victoria Institute in 1912, and published among the official documents of the organization. Dr. Flournoy traces the course of archeological investigation in a most interesting manner and shows how, step by step, conclusive corroboration of the genuineness and authenticity of the early Gospel writings was found. There are in existence, he tells us, more than three thousand manuscripts of the New Testament and a large number of verses, in various languages, besides luminous quotations from them in the little known works of ancient authors. No other book is attested and credited so fully from such sources. Even the number of manuscripts of the Latin and Greek classics bears no comparison with the manifold manuscripts of the New Testament.

One of the first archeological "finds" was the "Diatessaron," or Harmony of the Gospels, by Tatian, the Greek philosopher who was converted to Christianity under Justin Martyr in Rome. The very existence of this work was long denied, but it is now fully established. This result was largely due to the discovery in 1876 of the work of Ephraem Syrus, a Syrian (who died in 373 A.D.). He wrote a commentary on the Diatessaron, a copy of which came into the hands of Professor Moesinger of Salzburg University, who published it in Latin. It was not adequately recognized, however, until the Rev. Ezra Abbott directed attention to it in his work on John's Gospel in 1880. Still, the genuineness of the work of Syrus was disputed, and it was denied that it was based on Tatian's Harmony. It was not until a year later, 1881, when Professor Zahn published a reconstruction of the Diatessaron, that scholars of eminence admitted that it was evidently based upon the four Gospels.

"But this was not all," Dr. Flournoy continues. "There was an Arabic manuscript in the Vatican Library marked 'XIV' (theretofore unnoticed), which proved to be a translation of the Diatessaron itself! It had been there for a long time. Joseph Assemani had brought it to Rome from the East 162 years before. Ciasca (another writer and investigator) had known of it and had shown it to the Most Rev. Antonius Marcos, Visitor Apostolic of the Catholic Copts in Egypt, who, on examining it, told Ciasca that a gentleman in Egypt had a similar translation of the Diatessaron. This was subsequently procured and sent to the Vatican Library as a gift from Halim Dos Chali, the Copt, in 1886." This Arabic translation, while differing slightly from the one in the Vatican, was of great value, as it contained two leaves which were lacking from the other, and was generally more legible. Ciasca used both books in completing his translation. It is now to be had in English, with notes of comment, and is accepted by authorities generally.

THE importance of the Diatessaron—the Harmony of Tatian—consists in the fact that it contains practically every essential point that is found in the four Gospels on which the book was based. Investigation fails to reveal anything in it that can be satisfactorily traced to the numerous spurious or apocryphal Gospels, showing that the work of the four evangelists was, at the time when Tatian wrote, already accepted as the sole genuine authoritative canonical collection.

Justin Martyr, in one of his books, refers to "The Memoirs of the Apostles," which are also called Gospels (and which were no other than the four Gospels), being read in the public worship of the Christians of his day, along with the writings of the prophets, showing that they were even then classed in the category of sacred Scriptures. The Gospels were then a finished product, bearing no traces of evolution or material change.

Another remarkable archeological discovery was made in 1892, when an ancient writing, which is now accepted as antedating even the Diatessaron itself, was brought to light. Two learned women who had received decess from leading European universities and who were deeply interested in archeology, while on a journey in the East visited the old convent of St. Catherine on Mount Sinai. Mrs. Lewis and Mrs. Gibson, two sisters, while looking over some discarded folios in an upper chamber of the convent, discovered what seemed to be a copy of the early Syriac Gospels, but which proved on further examination to be what is now known as the Sinai Syriac Palimpsest (a palimpsest is a manuscript which has been written over or between the lines of some earlier writing, the original writing having faded or been erased). They took photographs of all the pages and brought them to Cambridge University, where they were subjected to an examination by the professors and afterward translated into English.

This notable discovery was met with delight by the foremost New Testament scholars of the day. There were in all in the recovered fragments, seventeen pages, the rest of the original never having been discovered, having probably been destroyed; but these

The New National Slogan

By LOUIS E. ORCUTT

WHEN the first ice had formed on the lake and our crowd of boys had gathered with our skates an "shinny" sticks, there was one formality that we never omitted. With one voice we called, "Oh, Herbert! Come here and try the ice!" If it held Herbert, the rest of us were safe, for Herbert was well set up and amply padded. In the summer when a new spring-board was established at the diving-hole, it was Herbert who took the first spring. I remember one board, an especially long and springy board of which we expected much. Herbert ran to the end as nimbly as that much of a dodo could run, swung his arms up and down once, then up the second time and down again but not up, for a season crack and a knot loved the elastic limit of the plank, and on the second time down Herbert kept right on going, accompanied by the major portion of the board. Oh, well, he expected to get wet anyway. We were not a "Safety First" society, we simply were exercising ordinary prudence as a result of more or less dry and chilly experience.

During the past few years it has seemed as if the mental cosmos of humanity had become inverted and prudence had given place to precipitancy. It was necessary for some one to say, "Oh, Herbert!" Public Safety Committees of Boards of Trade and of city governments, traffic officers of railways and of police corps, heads of life insurance companies, and many of the people at large struggled to combat the urging totals of accidents in shop and field and highway; and yet they seemed to struggle in vain. Then some one was inspired to cry, "Safety First," and the cry was heard and was taken up, until it has covered the country and has become the newest slogan of our national life.

The shops had gone a long way toward Safety First before the first society was organized under the slogan. They had not, however, and have not yet gone all the distance. A proper recognition of the value of assured safety will greatly lessen the toll of accidents in industry which in 1913, the last year for which the figures are available totaled over 300,000 serious accidents, of which 23,055 were fatal. With a very few exceptions all of these accidents were avoidable; hence the pertinence of the cry of "Safety First!"

The Safety First Society was organized in New York City late in 1913. Societies had been organized in Chicago and in Detroit, and other societies sprang up rapidly in widely separated communities. All of these local societies have now been united into the "Safety First Federation of America," Inc. of which Mr. Darwin P. Kinley, president of the New York Life Insurance Company, is president. The Federation will hold its first annual convention in Detroit October 19-21, 1914. Mr. Frederick H. Elliott, one of the first to get the vision of "Safety First," is the executive secretary and is in charge of the national offices in New York City.

The Safety First Society of New York found its first and most important work in helping to solve the problem of surface traffic in the greater city. One effective means was found in the first corollary of Safety First, namely: "Stop! Look! Listen!" Regulations for pedestrian travel were among the early suggestion of the society, this being the one of least resistance and of the quietest possible action—the pedestrian just wouldn't wait for Herbert, but would precipitate himself directly into the midst of trouble. In 1912 some 549 fatal accidents marred the surface traffic of New York. The following regulations were suggested to the traffic division of the New York police, the first two of which have been adopted with good results:

- (a) Restrain pedestrians at congested street intersections.
- (b) Indicate safety zones for pedestrians at congested street intersections.
- (c) Prohibit pedestrians from crossing in the middle of the block.

The society also began at once a campaign for near-side stops for street cars and public busses. Although the change was opposed by some of the transportation interests, the evidence from cities where it had been tried was so overwhelmingly in its favor that the Board of Aldermen passed the necessary ordinance. At the same time the society was conducting a continuous campaign for "Safety First" through the press, the schools, posters, calendars, motion pictures and every other avenue of publicity that offered. The results of the educational campaign and of the near-side stop are evident, as this table shows.

Persons Killed by Vehicles and Trolleys in Greater New York
Year	Autos	Trolleys	Wagons	Total
1912	246	134	169	549
1913	309	119	167	595
1914	290	100	128	518
Decrease in 1914 over 1913 77
Near Side Stop, Report of Third Avenue Railway Same Months
Sept., Oct., and Nov.	1913	1914	Decrease
Vehicle Collisions	1092	885	207
Knockdowns	214	176	38
Total Decrease in Accidents				245

Out of the various experiences of all the communities certain well-defined facts have been developed, and certain definite recommendations have been formulated by the Federation through its committees. The recommendations of most interest to the people of the country as a whole are:

The requiring of lights on all vehicles, especially of rear lights on horse-drawn vehicles.

The near-side stop for street cars. Elimination of glare of head and side lights on automobiles.

Designation of safety-zones and cross-walks.

Standard traffic ordinance and code of regulations for all cities.

Licensing of drivers or operators of all motor vehicles.

The elimination of the grade crossing where possible and the standardizing of the warning signs at the remaining highway crossings quirement for lights, rear and otherwise. The average driver seems not to realize that while he knows where he is, the stranger autoist coming up behind him is not so well informed. He seems to depend on the rear of his vehicle becoming apparent to the autoist in the light of the auto's headlights; and he forgets that dust, fog and curves in the road, each of which is less dangerous by a bright red tail-light, may result in damaged equipment if nothing worse. Education is the remedy here as in other phases of the work.

The railways have recognized the danger of the grade crossing for many years and are doing all they can to eliminate this danger. "Safety First" is making greater co-operation possible between the corporations and the communities; the communities are more ready to bear a share of the expense than they once were; and crossings that can not be elevated or depressed or closed are being guarded by gates, bells or watchmen. Nothing has yet been discovered to protect the autoist who approaches a railway crossing at top speed and dashes over with no regard to passing trains, gates or guards. Individuals are gradually being removed from consideration through the practice of doing it once too often. Such a solution of the problem can not be considered satisfactory, however, for they usually take innocent victims with them. The crossed white boards will be the established signal of the railway crossing and all crossings will be so designated as fast as the railways can be brought to see the desirability of uniformity in this respect.

It may seem from a casual reading of the accomplishments and aims of the Safety First Federation that their activities and recommendations are more necessary for and more suited to the cities than to the country and the smaller towns. Safety may be less imperiled outside of the larger cities, but the trolley car and the steam railway and the automobile cover the country, and no lane, however quiet and secluded, is assured against danger from one or the other. Recklessness is not wholly an urban quality either. There was a time when the machinery on the farm consisted of the windmill, the grindstone and the mowing-machine. Even then they occasionally buried a farmer who had tried to oil the windmill without stopping it. Today the gasoline tractor, the separator, the feed-grinder, the internal-combustion engine, which is skidded around from one duty to another, the reaper and the threshing outfit make the farm almost as much of a mechanical establishment as the machine shop; and the necessity

First as immediate there as it is in the city. In almost any of the smaller towns you will find a dangerous crossing, a sharp curve in the approach to a bridge or a steep hill that ends in a short turn. Safety First would guard that crossing and would place warning signs at bridge approach and hill-top.

Next to traffic and industrial safety comes safety from fire; and the Safety First Federation has undertaken a national campaign of education on the subject of fire prevention. They are seeking uniform fire prevention legislation in all the states, with the establishment of state fire-marshals whose duty it will be to ferret out the reasons for fires, to locate the persons responsible for questionable fires, and to promote in every way legislation and means of education that will tend to make possible a decrease in our annual losses.

The newspapers and the schools, ably supported by the moving-picture theater, are proving the greatest promoters of Safety First. In New York one winter's campaign in the schools reduced by fifty per cent. the accidents to children. Children are quick to receive impressions and equally quick to act upon them; and the moving pictures, showing common delinquencies in carelessness, have resulted in a marked lessening of those particular practices on the part of the children who have seen the pictures. The newspapers have seen the value of Safety First, and while the various organizations interested have bought newspaper space liberally in the furthering of their propaganda, much additional space has been used voluntarily by the papers from considerations of news and of public service. Herbert is being called from one end of the country to the other, and caution is winning converts from recklessness in a way that would have seemed impossible three years ago when Safety First was young.

IS there nothing to be said about Safety First in realms other than the material? The individual who is careful and who avoids an accident ministers to his own good; if he carries life insurance and lives a year longer through failure to be reckless, he lowers the cost of insurance to every policy holder in his company; if he spares a public service corporation the necessity of settling with his executors, he increases the fund available for betterments or for dividends. This is all very much of the earth, earthy, and of finance, financial.

How about the man who is tempted to take the first glass? Safety First would stay his hand and close his lips forever to the stuff that steals men's brains and that leaves the empty shell to crumble into a forgotten grave. Safety First would halt the pilfering finger of the defaulter and stop the pen of the forger; it would close every red-light district and discourage every attempt upon chastity and character, it would even end mad murder, and it might set thieves to seeking honest employment.

Safety First would open the cross-roads churches and set again those almost forgotten signs of warning on the highroad to carelessness, indifference and godlessness. Safety First might even impel men to seek assurance of the certainty of an eternity untinted with the fire of remorse, the flame that burneth and is not quenched. Personal safety may not be the most holy of motives for godliness; but if it is effective a holier motive may follow as the road of righteousness is followed toward the ultimate goal. The man who would sin could do worse than to call, "Oh, Herbert!" Let him read Herbert's experiences with sin in Ecclesiastes.

THE WAR IN EUROPE

THE most interesting and important event in the past week (September 3-9), was the removal of the Grand Duke Nicholas Nicolaivitch from the chief command of the Russian armies, and the assumption of the duties and responsibilities of that position by the Czar himself. This, however, may be regarded as a temporary expedient until the Czar and his advisers choose another general capable of taking full command.

The Czar announced this important change in a telegraphic message from his residence near Petrograd to President Poincaré, under date of September 6, and received a most cordial response. It seems significant, to say the least, that the Russian emperor omitted to notify the other rulers allied with him in this war; no mention is made in the press of such communications. The Czar, in taking command, issued the following signed order to the armies of the empire:

"Today I have taken supreme command of the sea and of the land forces operating in the theater of war. With firm faith in the clemency of God and with unshaken assurances of final victory we shall fulfil our sacred duty to defend our country to the last. We shall not dishonor the Russian land."

The Grand Duke issued the following statement to the army:

"Valiant Army and Fleet: Today

your august supreme chief, His Majesty the Emperor, places himself at your head. I bow before your heroism of more than a year and express to you my cordial, warm and sincere appreciation.

"I believe steadfastly that because the Emperor himself, to whom you have taken your oath, conducts you, you will display achievements hitherto unknown. I believe that God from this day will accord to his elect his all-powerful aid and will bring to him victory."

The Grand Duke has been appointed viceroy of the Caucasus and commander of the Russian troops operating in that territory against the Turks. This position bears about the same proportion to the position from which he has just been removed, that a postmaster in a country town does to the postmaster-general of the United States. The duties of viceroy are merely ornamental, while those of the commander-in-chief against the Turks are nearly so, since for many months there has been little fighting in this campaign, and it may be seriously doubted whether the strongest side numerically now has more than from forty to fifty thousand men on the firing line.

The fact that the Czar has been to remove the Grand Duke from command is indicative of a very increase in his power lately and the power of the party in Russia who is supporting him. A few months ago the Grand Duke, the head of the military party, had complete control of the army with all that that means, and besides was supported energetically by the most powerful section of the Russian bureaucracy, as well as by the majority of the Russian political leaders.

So strong was he at this time that there was more or less half-operation of the expediency of replacing the Czar by him, and had he had no direct heir this discussion would have been even more serious. Opposed to him was a comparatively small party of which the Czar was the nominal head, and Count Witte and the Empress Dowager the real leaders, to which the name of "Peace Party" was somewhat derisively given. Count Witte, as will be remembered, died suddenly in the early part of the year, and as a result the future of this party looked dark.

But the succession of severe defeats the past months first estranged the political leaders and the bureaucracy from the Grand Duke, and these defeats continuing and increasing in importance.

Before They Call He Will Answer

WHAT if China should again become a monarchy, and Confucianism the state religion?

What effect will such a movement have upon the advancing of the banners of Jesus Christ within that teeming country?

To ask this latter question is at the same time to answer it, for the difficulties in the path of Christianity in China, already great, will be magnified a hundredfold if China becomes a monarchy and Confucianism the state religion.

But that China must receive the Gospel cannot be questioned. The mandate of Christ himself will never be recalled: "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature." Some day some inspired writer will produce a history of missions in which the dominant note will be the wonderful ways in which God backed up, as it were, this command, by causing things to come to pass that at the time were not perceived by our blind eyes to be what they were. Yet we have always felt sure, here in the Christian Herald office, that the charitable work our readers have undertaken in the support and education of Chinese orphans is in very truth a preparation of Gospel messengers against a time of need in China.

And now, in the prospect of this great change in the religious and political system of the republic, we see rich possibilities in this beautiful work. These young boys and girls have already shown rare aptitude for missionary work among their people as they approached responsible years and have left the care of the orphanages to take up their lifework. Many of them are out-and-out Gospel workers, while most of them are at least written epistles of Christ's love, read and heeded by those with whom they come in contact.

We might dwell on the humane side of this work, in bringing it anew to our readers' attention. We might tell you once more how these girls are found as cast-outs, undesired little ones, victims-to-be of greed and worse in whatever evil persons may care to take them in for what they may be worth. We might ask you to think of your little lad left an orphan, hated by his relatives, forced out into a society that has no organized regard for the helpless, there to be the sport of evil chance. But we will not speak of these things now. We think it far more important to emphasize the splendid possibilities that reside in this work for setting free within the land of China just this much more of Gospel energy, Gospel dynamics, to work the will of God, who knows what the future needs of that people are to be, and what his church must do still to preach the Gospel to every creature in that land.

There are 880 orphans still dependent upon Christian Herald readers for this Christianizing care. Absolutely dependent upon Christian Herald readers. It costs only twenty dollars for the full support and education of each one of these for a year. How easily many of our readers might each provide for one such life so important to the future of Christianity in China! And gratefully we add, how many of our readers are already doing just this! And many more have regularly contributed lesser amounts, still more have contributed once or twice. The work has been splendidly supported by the Christian Herald Family, and yet a deficit has occurred at this time. We are advancing fifteen hundred dollars to make up the quarterly amount that must be at once forwarded to the orphanages, and after that, another quarter's remittance of $4,400 will have to be taken care of. Do we need to do more than state these facts?

We wish that every one of our readers might have a share in this work. Individuals, individual families, Sunday school classes, missionary societies, all such units are urged to "adopt" one of these orphans by name and become responsible for his or her annual support, twenty dollars. And where other demands prevent that, then by all means take some part in this work: the smallest gift has always been welcome for this cause, because we are sure that our readers do not send less than they can afford. Send, then, what you can as your part in carrying out what is so evidently a divine purpose in China. As you see, the financial need is urgent. Let us have a prompt and generous response to this call. Address the China Orphans Fund, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

David Lloyd George

DOES LABOR CONTROL THE WAR? Addressing the trades union congress at Bristol, England, September 9, David Lloyd George, Minister of Munitions, made a fervid appeal to the workmen of the realm to put aside for the present all questions of unionism, the open shop, etc., in order that the government might be able to depend upon every skilled and unskilled man and woman in the munitions factories. He declared that "unless the unions allow an unqualified relaxation of the union rules, we are making straight for disaster. Every hour counts, every hour means death, every hour takes us farther from victory and nearer defeat unless it is an hour spent by the nation in putting its whole strength into this great struggle for freedom for the democracies of Europe." The utmost importance is attached to the speech, which is declared to be one of the greatest this statesman has ever made, and to have been delivered in a state of high emotion. He declared that upwards of 300,000 skilled and unskilled men and women must be set at work by the government if England is to play the part assigned to it in the war. The burden of his speech was that the great conflict is in the making of the mechanics of the belligerent nations. All previous efforts to obtain the best cooperation of the British workmen he resulted. Mr. Lloyd George said, in a fifteen per cent. of available machinery big worked on night shifts in addition to regular time and he declared that the army could not be equipped unless the unions suspend their rules against unskilled labor. Labor interests of England have recently spoken out against conscription. The fitness with which the Minister of Munitions handled the labor subject in public is a tribute of the gravity of the situation.

ALVESTON STILL FIRMLY ON THE MAP. With a zest for spectacular news that sometimes leads reporters into the realm of imagination, the news gatherers appear to have added a few touches to the sufficiently hard ones which the storm of August 16-17 dealt Galveston and other points in Texas. So far as was the loss of life and property. Galveston is nevertheless better protected by her great sea wall than at first seemed the case, and the city wishes the world to know that it considers itself as safe as well as desirable place of residence and business. One of our own correspondents writes us that he has been the full length of the sea wall several times since the storm and that it is as solid as strong as the day it was finished.

THE NEW COUNSELOR OF STATE. President Wilson has appointed Judge Frank Lyon Polk, a grand-nephew of President James K. Polk, Counselor of the Department of State upon the recommendation of Secretary of State Lansing, who was formerly Counselor of the Department, and Judge Polk has assumed his duties. Judge Polk is a native of New York State and has been an active figure in the New York City administration and as corporate counsel. He was with Mayor Mitchell when an attack was made upon the latter's life, and was wounded in the struggle.

SPAIN CANCELS ROYAL VISIT TO THE UNITED STATES. The country learns through the announcement that he has had to abandon his plans for a visit to America because of the war, that King Alfonso of Spain had been preparing to so honor us. In the interview announcing his change of plan he stated that it was his dream to visit us, and discussing the war said: "After the war nations will arm more than ever. Socialism will become daily more governmental. After the war there will be no unemployment. The contrary there will be work for all and it will be necessary to work."

RIENDS OF PEACE. Their motives challenged by the press, various organizations which make up the society of the Friends of Peace, nevertheless held a convention in Chicago, with a mass meeting on Labor Day night at which resolutions were adopted against the continued manufacture and exportation of war munitions but without a demand for an embargo. The great gathering went on record for adjustment of present international disputes between this country and any of the belligerents, by peaceful methods where possible. There are a number of influential organizations in this united movement of which John Brisben Walker is chairman and Alexander P. Moore of Pittsburgh, secretary. One of the Chicago meeting appears to be the formulation of a united campaign, perhaps with a political cast, to attain their ends.

THE NEW NAVAL ADVISORY BOARD. Secretary of the Navy Josephus Daniels, on September 12, announced the completion of the Board of Inventors who will help the government to improve the country's defense system at the highest point of efficiency.

The Board consists of twenty-three members, Thomas A. Edison being chairman. The others may be briefly introduced as follows: W. R. Whitney, Schenectady, N. Y., electrical expert; L. H. Backeland, Yonkers, N. Y., chemist and inventor of photographic paper; Frank Julian Sprague, New York City, electrical power expert; B. G. Lamme, Pittsburg, Ohio, electrical engineer; Robert Simpson Woodward, Washington, D. C., president Carnegie Institution and authority on astronomy, geography and mathematical physics; Arthur Gordon Webster, Worcester, Mass., expert on science of sound; Andrew Murray Hunt, New York City, consulting engineer on power plants; Alfred Craven, New York City, construction engineer; Matthew Bacon Sellers, Baltimore, Md., authority on wind pressures; Hudson Maxim, Brooklyn, N. Y., inventor of explosives; Peter Cooper Hewitt, New York City, electrical expert; Thomas Robbins, Stamford, Conn., inventor of devices for hoisting ores, etc.; Andrew L. Riker, Detroit, Mich., electrical and mechanical engineer; Howard E. Coffin, Detroit, Mich., authority on internal combustion engines; William Laurence Saunders, New York City, inventor of rock drilling devices; Benjamin Boditch Thayer, New York City, authority on explosives; Joseph William Richards, South Bethlehem, Pa., writer on electrical subjects; Lawrence Addicks, Chrome, N. J., authority on copper; William LeRoy Emmet, Schenectady, N. Y., authority on electric propulsion for ships; Spencer Miller, South Orange, N. J., inventor of ship coating apparatus; Henry Alexander Wise Wood, New York City, naval aeronautics; Elmer Ambrose Sperry, Chicago, Ill., authority on gyroscope stabilizers for ships and aeroplanes.

10 per cent. vote will be necessary to make the Prohibition Act a law, and the decrease in colonial revenues caused by the war is a factor in favor of the opposition as the annual revenue from the liquor business is estimated at $300,000. It is predicted that because of the difficulty of importing liquor into a territory surrounded by water, if this Act becomes a law prohibition will have a unique opportunity to demonstrate its claim.

A NEW MAP DESTROYER. "Blasting towns off the map," is the diversion in which a huge aeroplane just completed by an American firm for the British Government, is said to excel. Accounts of the testing of the aeroplane's flying powers at Toronto appeared in the press of September 9. The "Canada," as the giant war flyer is named, measures 102 feet from tip to tip of the wings, and is roomy enough to give two rapid-fire guns free play in every direction. Two 160 horsepower motors will drive her 90 miles an hour. A ton of cargo was carried in the tests. Bombs of twenty-five to two hundred pounds will be thrown from the Canada by a device which the makers claim cannot miss the mark, and if the mark is a town and the bomb a 200-pounder, zipp goes a bit of the map. War is beautiful. It is said a squadron of twenty, at a cost of about $30,000 each, was ordered as a result of the test, and that the British Government will order as many more as the American plant can turn out.

HOW BIG NEW YORK IS. The recent census of New York State shows a total population of 9,773,817, of whom 5,066,222 live in the city of New York. Manhattan, 2,143,061; Brooklyn 1,803,191; Bronx, 622,635; Queens, 398,651; Richmond, 98,684. The increase in New York city since 1910 is only about 300,000.

AUSTRIA ASKED TO RECALL AMBASSADOR. Because of his activity in a movement to cripple the war munitions industry in this country by fomenting strikes among Austrian and German laborers, Dr. Constantin Theodor Dumba, ambassador from Austria-Hungary, has been declared to be no longer acceptable to the government of the United States, and Secretary of State Lansing on September 9 instructed Ambassador Penfield of Vienna, to deliver a formal note requesting Dr. Dumba's recall. The ambassador's undiplomatic conduct was made known through the discovery of a letter to the Austrian Prime Minister in possession of an American traveler by the name of Archibald who, under the protection of an American passport, was acting as an intermediary. Dr. Dumba claimed that he was acting under instructions from his government in planning to prevent war supplies going to the Allies from this country. There are others implicated in the plot and further developments may be expected. The Austro-Hungarian Government has not yet acceded to the request of the American Government to recall Dr. Dumba, but early action is confidently expected. The relations of the two governments are of course, strained by this incident, but in diplomatic circles it is not understood that there is ground here for a breach between the two governments. Indiscreet diplomats have always invited their dismissal from the government to which they have been accredited, and there is indeed no alternative when a foreign ambassador oversteps the bounds of diplomatic propriety.

NOT EVEN STANDING ROOM AT THE FOOT OF THE LADDER. The first congress of thrifty folks was held at the Panama-Pacific Exposition recently, and in the course of his address to the delegates S. W. Straus, president of the American Society for Thrift, gave the American people these startling facts to think over: According to government statistics, 98 per cent. of us live from day to day on our wages. A loss of employment would mean pauperism to all but two per cent. of us. Of 20,250,000 families, less than 6,000,000 own their homes, 11,000,000 being renters. There are 878,798,325 acres of farm land in the United States, slightly over half of which are improved. Discarded tin cans, kitchen utensils, etc., gathered off dump heaps of large cities in one year, produced material valued at $14,000,000. Out of every 100 who die, 66 leave no property; of the 34 who do, 9 leave more than $5,000 worth, the balance less than $1300 each. At the age of sixty-five, 97 out of every 100 of us are partly or wholly dependent upon relatives or the public. School children by planting and cultivating gardens in back yards and vacant lots could add $200,000,000 each year to the national wealth. (And yet the speaker only scratched the surface of our national thriftlessness.)

PEACE HATH HER MILLIONAIRES NO LESS RESOLVED THAN WAR'S. While representatives of "big business" urge the country on to "preparedness," equally able business men are getting together to oppose that movement with a campaign for world peace. Henry Ford, the manufacturer, whose stanch stand for peace was reported in these columns recently, afterward announced an initial contribution of a million dollars for such a campaign, and almost at once increased the fund to ten millions. Practical methods are to be devised by Mr. Ford, John Wanamaker and Thomas A. Edison. A rival manufacturer has offered a bonus to all employees who get into military trim, according to the press.

MILLIONS MIGRATING TO CENTRAL AND SOUTH AMERICA. The New York Times states that scarlet tanagers, thrushes, nighthawks, swallows, purple martens, terns, golden plovers, and many other birds are leaving the northern climes en masse to winter in the far southlands, traveling mostly by night and at the rate of thirty to forty and even fifty miles an hour. The champion migrator is the golden plover, which covers the 2400-mile route from Nova Scotia to South America without stopping. The Times' writer states that climate has nothing to do with this annual excursion south, an intangible inner force starting the birds off and back again in the Spring.

RENEWED TENSION OVER SUBMARINE WARFARE. Late on Saturday evening, September 4, the steamship Hesperian, bound from Liverpool for Montreal, was sunk by an explosion by either torpedo or floating mine and of the 650 persons aboard, 350 of whom were passengers, 25 are understood to have perished. This was reported as a submarine attack but the circumstances, including whether or not the vessel was armed, are still matters of official investigation. A few days later the State Department at Washington received a new note from the German government on the subject of the sinking of the Arabic, setting up as a defense that the submarine's commander declares the liner was evidently determined to attack him. Because of this incident the German government declined to offer indemnity for the loss of American lives though expressing deep regret. The note proposed that if the two governments could not agree, the subject be referred to the Hague tribunal for arbitration. Disposition of these two cases will rest upon the determination of the facts.

Prevailing Prayer

A SERMON BY REV. A. C. DIXON*

TEXT: "One of his disciples said unto him, Lord, teach us to pray, as John also taught his disciples." Luke 11:1

PRAYER is asking God to give or do something. Prayer is not praise; it is not worship. Praise ought to go with it; thanksgiving and worship ought to be mingled with petition; but prayer as defined by the Lord Jesus is asking God to give or do something. "Ask, and ye shall receive." "If ye shall ask anything in my name, I will do it."

God's gifts we need, but more than gifts we need the Giver. God himself at work is the need of the church. Andrew Murray's great book on Intercessory Prayer has this proposition as its basis, that in dealing with his people God works in answer to prayer; not preaching, not organization, but prayer. If we trust our preaching, we shall get what preaching can do. If we trust our money, we shall get what money can do. If we trust our organization, we shall get what organization can do. But if we pray and trust God, we shall get what God can do, greater than all preaching, money and organization.

Let us go a step further: Prayer is asking God to give or do something within the circle of his will. It is unthinkable that God should give or do something outside the circle of his will. That would be immoral.

"This is the boldness which we have toward him, that, if we ask anything according to his will, he heareth us." And his will is a large circle. Salvation for the lost is the will of God. The Holy Spirit for service is the will of God. Workers for the harvest field is the will of God. Pray that they may be sent forth.

There are many things about which we ought to say "Thy will be done;" but when God has revealed to us his will, we may omit that, and confidently expect him to answer all we ask within that circle. We know that it is God's will to save the lost, and that it is his will to give us the Holy Spirit, for he has told us so. It is his will that harvesters should be in the field; it is his will that his people should be sanctified. The circle of his will about these things is clearly marked, and prayer is asking God to give or do something within the circle of his revealed will.

The Secret of Knowing His Will

ANOTHER step: Prayer is asking God to give or do something within the circle of his will specified by human wish and will. "What things soever ye desire, when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them." "Lord, have mercy on us." "What will ye that I should do unto you?" "Lord, that our eyes may be opened." Then, "straightway they received their sight."

The Lord waited for the general wish to be specified; and in order for prayer to be answered it must be definite. The man who came at midnight asked for three loaves—not four loaves, but three; and he pleaded for the three because that was what he needed.

General prayers amount to little. They may be helpful as a spiritual exercise; we may get a sort of reflex blessing from them; but the prayers that secure the gift and act of God are very definite. "Whatsoever things ye desire, when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them." Focalize your prayers, and tell God exactly what you want.

"I have set watchmen upon thy walls, O Jerusalem, which shall never hold their peace day nor night; ye that are the Lord's remembrancers, keep not silence, and give him no rest, till he establish, and till he make Jerusalem a praise in the earth." Remind God. He asks you to do so. He requests you to disturb him. "Give him no rest" until your Jerusalem—whether it be this church or some other work upon your heart—shall be made a praise in the earth.

Along the line of this definite, specified request comes importunity. When there is something definite which you feel that you must have, you are certain to be importunate. And we are told to press the plea, to come again and again, reminding God of the definite request until it shall be granted.

Again: Prayer is asking God to give or do something within the circle of his will, specified by human wish and will in the name of Christ. Of course, for the sake of Christ, but that is not all of it. In the name of Christ means within the character of Christ. "Name" in the Bible stands for character. Prayer within the circle of God's will is in the character of Christ. It would be unfitting to ask an honest man to permit you to steal, a truthful man to permit you to lie. And asking the Lord Jesus Christ to do something outside the limitations of his character is equally incongruous. Bring your desire, your definite need, to the test of the character of Christ. Ask, does this harmonize with what I know to be the character of the Lord Jesus? Is it within the circle of God's will? If so, I may press my claim; I may pray and keep on praying until the answer shall be given.

The Great Objective

ASTEP further still: Prayer is asking God to give or do something within the circle of his will, specified by human wish and will, in the name of Christ, that the Father may be glorified. "Ye ask, and receive not, because ye ask amiss, that ye may consume it upon your lusts." For God to answer a selfish prayer would be to cultivate selfishness. For God to give what you wish to consume upon your own pleasures, would be to pander to a worldly spirit.

A good woman came to me and said: "Oh, pastor, pray that the Lord may restore my health." I said, "My sister, what do you want with health?" I knew up to that time she had been spending it in frivolities. She replied, "I cannot attend to my social duties." She wanted a restoration of health that she might continue to waste it upon her selfish desires. For God to answer a prayer of that kind might really be doing her an injury. "That the Father may be glorified." Is it your purpose to glorify God? Is that your single wish, or are you trying to promote some selfish interest? Are you willing that all your efforts shall make simply for the glory of God? If so, press your petition, and the more definite it is, the sooner it will be granted.

Finally: Prayer is asking God to give or do something within the circle of his will, specified by human wish and will, in the name of Christ, that the Father may be glorified, while we are in fellowship with God and with one another.

"If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you." If you are abiding in Christ as the branch abides in the vine; like the branch asking the vine for sap and life, that it may be fruitful and useful, ye may ask Christ what ye will, for there is no discord between the will of the branch and the will of the vine, and no discord between the branches themselves. "I am the vine, ye are the branches." Vine and branches are one, working together for the single purpose of fruit-bearing.

"If ye abide in me." That means more than child-life. The child can be five thousand miles away from the parent and yet live; but if the branch is a thousandth part of an inch away from the vine, it dies. Branch-life means abiding life; and if you are in harmony with God, God's thoughts and God's will and God's purpose circulating through your spiritual arteries and veins, what you ask for will be the expression of God's wish and will. "Whatsoever we ask, we receive of him because we keep his commandments, and do those things that are pleasing in his sight." There is to be no discord between us and God.

Having the Mind of Christ

BUT "when ye stand praying, forgive, if ye have baught against any." There is to be not only harmony with Christ, but harmony with Christians, harmony with your fellows. The unforgiving spirit prevents an answer to prayer. When you pray, stop and think: Am I in harmony with God? Am I willing to do his will? Am I at variance with my neighbor? Have I an unforgiving spirit towards anybody? If so, bring that under the blood, and have God to touch it away before you go a step further in your prayer. Harmony with God and a forgiving spirit towards everybody is necessary to successful praying.

If I were to take a census now as to how many of us spend every day of our lives half an hour in prayer, how many would respond? Such a census was taken in a ministers' meeting in New York City, when 150 pastors were present, and very few responded. More responded that they spent fifteen minutes a day in prayer, and a still larger number that they spent ten minutes. When it came down to five minutes, all of them rose; but one man said, "I am afraid I am lying now; for I am not sure that I spend five consecutive minutes any day in prayer."

"Thou, when thou prayest, enter into thine inner chamber, and having shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret; and thy Father which seeth in secret shall reward thee openly." Prayer may be public or private, but all prayer is secret; it is always a personal transaction between the soul and God. Whenever you pray, in private or public, enter into the inner chamber; shut the door; and let there be a personal dealing between God and you, and God that heareth in secret will reward you openly.

Before the grave of Lazarus our Lord Jesus "hid up his eyes and said, Father, I thank thee that thou hearest me"—not "that thou hearest me," but "that thou hearest me." He had been dead three days, and you will find that in Perea our Lord Jesus had heard of the death of Lazarus; and somewhere between the place where he heard of it and that sepulcher, potentially Lazarus had been raised from the dead. "Father, I thank thee that thou hearest me back there. I know that thou always hearest me. I knew it then. My prayer was answered before I got here. Lazarus to my vision of faith was alive." Our Lord was heard in secret and rewarded openly.

It was in secret that God heard Elijah, and the heavens were looked; and then in secret that God heard Elijah again and the rain came.

Melancthon's knees at his death were found to be calloused with much kneeling, and Martin Luther said, "To have prayed well is to have studied well." He spent three hours every day in the inner chamber with God, and the Reformation was his reward in public.

The Sight that Causes Satan to Tremble

NOW there are ten thousand Lazaruses within a mile of us in their spiritual graves. Can they be raised? Not by walking out in cold blood in front of their sepulchers and saying, "Lazarus, come forth!" What you say will be sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal. The dead will remain dead. What we need is to raise the dead before we go to the sepulcher; to gain the victory before we reach the battlefield. Gain the victory in secret with God and the public reward in answered prayer will be certain.

In my early ministry, a revival broke out in my church unexpectedly on a rainy day. Rather than in a schoolhouse adjacent to the country church where I was preaching. The Lord gave us nearly a hundred conversions within less than ten days, and I could hardly explain it. I was not expecting it, and I did not find anybody else who was expecting it. On the last day of the mission it was explained. A motherly woman came up to me, grasped my hand, and with a trembling voice said, "Oh, my boy—for I was but a boy preacher—when I heard that you were going to preach here Sunday afternoon, though I was sixty miles away teaching school, I said, 'I will spend every minute he preaches waiting upon God to save those in the community where I was born and reared. When news reached me that you were preaching every afternoon and evening, I missed my school half an hour earlier that I might pray every hour you preached, for God to save my brothers, sisters, nieces, nephews and neighbors. Of the first one whom you received into the church this morning, one was my brother, another my niece, another my nephew, all of them my neighbors and friends. God answered my prayer, and I have just come to rejoice with you." I saw the secret of it then! There was a woman in the inner chamber, with the door shut, and God who heard in secret had rewarded openly.

The need of today is the church in the inner chamber with God, gaining the victory for the home and foreign field. "Lord, teach us to pray." Not how to pray, or what to pray, though he does teach us and what. But we know better how to pray and what to pray than we pray. If Satan, the messenger of light for this age, can keep us so busy with other good things that we neglect prayer, he will defeat us.

Comment by the Way

—VERY SIGNIFICANT of the broadening view that is taken of war and its aftermath is this passage from a leading article in the London Times of June 17. The war, it says—

"Must put an end to the notion of world-powers altogether. It must be fought on our side in the hope of a future United States of Europe and, further, of a United States of the World. And must believe ourselves, and make our belief plain to others, that we hold our empire in trust for that future, using it now with all reserve power against any nation that aims at predominance, and not ourselves wishing to gain any predominance through exercise of that power."

"People may say that the United States of Europe are far so, happily, is the predominance of any one world-power; and matters very much toward which far-off goal we and the other nations set out. . . . It was the spectacle of the British Empire more than anything else that made others dream of world-power for themselves. So, even if they are taught not to aim at it, some other nation will dream their dream and have to learn their lesson, unless we make it plain that we wish our empire not to dwarf Europe, but to be lost at last in the United States of Europe, and that meanwhile we are trustees for these future United States. If we can make this plain to all the world, we shall not have shed our blood in vain."

The Buoyancy of Faith

UNDAY, September 26. Matthew 14: 29. "He walked upon the waters to come to Jesus." Faith is always the secret of buoyancy. We can plant our footsteps in the sea when our faith is strong in the Lord. The waves can never overwhelm us. We ride upon the storm. When Mrs. Beth, the mother of the Salvation Army, was dying she witnessed in great triumph, "The waters are rising, but I am not sinking!" When old Mr. Host, in Bunyan's story, reached the river he found that, in Christ Jesus, its destructiveness was broken, and he went through the waters singing, "Oce reigns!" And so it is in all the rivers and seas through which the believer has to pass; he cannot be holden of them, he rises above them, he is the superior in the Lord. And thus the believer in Christ Jesus is to be distinguished by his buoyancy. This is to be his song, as he confronts the most tremendous seas: "There-fore will we not fear, though the waters roar and be troubled!" His fame is to be that of the man whom nothing can sink. He is to be always on the top of circumstances, their master and not their slave. Like the apostle Paul he is to be "always confident," knowing whom he has believed. When the spirits of others are sinking he is to be the one to hearten them, to lift them up by his own unquenchable cheer. He is to sing songs in the night. And what times are these for the display of spiritual buoyancy! What great reasons for walking the troubled seas! What opportunities for witnessing to the power of the resurrection in lifting the soul above the floods of death and hell! For the Lord himself is on the deep. He walks the waters which he calls us to tread. He does not send us on a daring buoyonely errand; he invites us into his fellowship. To walk on the deep is a journey with the Lord. And therefore, by faith, we share his conquests. "I work that I do shall ye do also." We can walk the stormy sea! And when those who do not know the Lord look upon our power to rise above troubled circumstance, their souls will begin to move toward the secret of our life, and by faith they also shall find the same uplifting strength in the fellowship of Christ. The Commanding Power of Prayer

MONDAY, September 27. Isaiah 45: 1-13. "Ask of me of things to come. . . . Command ye me." God is always saying, "Ask, seek, knock." Even to the Lord Jehovah says, "Ask of me, and I will give thee thine inheritance." And to the chosen people (at the close of a paragraph begun with "I will," and unfolding the work which he is eager to perform on their behalf), he says: "For this, moreover, will I be inquired of by the house of Israel, to say it for them." Is it not in the same spirit that the apostle James insists that we have not because we ask not? The fact is that prayer is a necessary link in the accomplishment of the divine purpose. It is necessary on God's side, as well as on ours. God does not do certain things for us, apart from our prayers. Our failure to pray is the reason why he cannot interpose on our behalf, and for the coming of the Kingdom among men. Remember how he calls on his remembrancers to give him no rest; and how our Lord taunts us that God awaits our prayer, saying, "Pray ye at the Lord of the harvest would send forth laborers into his harvest." Is it not certain that prayer is as necessary to the divine Workman as the hammer to the door, or the pivot to the lever? But how much closer it is to find that God goes further and places the believer in a position to command his resources and help! Here is commanding indeed! Yet there can be no mistake. "Concerning my sons and concerning the work of my hands, command ye me." In proportion as we yield to God, we become allied with God; and when we are allied with God, we come into the throne-life. F. B. M.

Liberty of the Spirit

TUESDAY, September 28. II Corinthians 3: 17. "Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty." We live in an age that demands liberty of thought and action. We want independence. We, like the Greeks, wish to do what we want to do without trammels. We hear much in certain quarters about the need of the chance to express our own individuality, without regard to laws or to our influence upon others. It is an age of breadth, and sometimes it is breadth for its own sake, not for any human good. It is a kind of selfish liberty—liberty to reject and not to accept, to criticize and not to construct, to sneer and not to sympathize. We want to be free in order to boast of it, rather than to use our liberty for service to humanity.

Paul is an advocate of freedom. He has much to say about being free, and in this word to the Corinthians he says that the true freeman is he who has had the veil of the letter that killeth lifted, and who is given liberty by the Spirit of God, the spirit of love that brings the spirit of life.

It is sometimes useful to ask ourselves, "Why do I want to be free from restraint?" Is it because I want to use my liberty to aid a needy brother? or is it to gratify some sordid or sensual desire? A man may be justified at times in breaking the speed limit in hurrying an injured man to the hospital; but if he break it to gratify his wild desire for speed, or that he may talk about it afterward as a praiseworthy performance, his liberty has become a wild and useless license. The real liberty is that which frees the spirit. The reputation of being broad or independent of what people think of one is not a thing to be envied. Unless our breadth is for a useful, an unselfish purpose, it is a child's bauble and unworthy of a man. As Americans we love liberty because it gives us an equal chance to work and to succeed. As Christians we love liberty from restricting literalism of creed, because it gives our spirits a chance to grow and go out in loving service. C. S. C.

The Unchangeable Love of Christ

WEDNESDAY, September 29. John 13: 1-11. "He loved them until the end." When the hour of departure approaches, though slight references may be made to it, love has a new tenderness in its expression. The thoughtfulness of the one who is going for the heartache and vacancy of those who are left, imparts an accent to the voice and a delicacy to the touch, which live long after in the home. All that was present to our Lord, who was spending the last hours of his mortal life with those he loved. He loved them utterly. There was nothing lacking or deficient. Not a drop more could have been added to the brimming cup that he placed to their lips. They were his own, given him by the Father. He had a sense of proprietorship in them, which differentiated them from all others. "Thine they were, and thou gavest them me."

Side by side with this love, there was more than ever before the consciousness of oneness with the Father and his unity with Him before the world was made. We might have supposed that this would have alienated him from his poor friends; but his thoughts were far otherwise. Just because of his quick perception of the holiness of the Father, and his own unity with it, he was more acutely conscious of the unholiness of those disciples who had been disputing as to who was the greatest. He could not leave them thus, and immediately set himself to the task of cleansing them and shedding the divine love abroad in their hearts. The most perfect musician will be tortured by the first attempts of his little daughter to play the piano, but his very love prevents his acquiescence in her imperfection, and through long years it will labor till she also is perfected. Meditation and Conversation

THURSDAY, September 30. Job 28: 18. "For the price of wisdom is above rubies." Job is speaking of a thing that every one can have—knowledge. The riches of wisdom are jewels that any one can find by digging in the right mines. Victor Hugo said: "He that opens a school closes a prison." Americans believe this, for they spend vast appropriations annually on their public schools.

But wisdom is not to be found wholly in books; it waits upon thought and the power to meditate. It comes often in right kinds of conversation with our friends. Locke said: "Reading is but collecting the rough materials, among which a great deal must be laid aside as useless. Meditation is, as it were, choosing and fitting the materials, framing the timbers, squaring and laying the stones, and raising the buildings; . . . and discourse with a friend helps often to discover truths, and fix them in our minds, as much as either the other two."

Many a man's life has been lifted and transformed by his quiet thoughts on a starry night walking alone by the sea, or by a solitary ramble in the woods, or a quiet, meditative hour in his own room in a big city. No vision, and one might almost say no wisdom, without the quietness that permits our souls to speak! It is an old proverb that "God comes to us without a bell."

The conversations we hold and the people with whom we hold them also determine our progress toward true education. Jowett, the great master of Balliol College, once said to a student who in his presence made a flat remark about the weather: "If you haven't something more valuable to say than that, you had best be silent." The motto of one great man was: "I shall try to converse with at least one superior man every day!" C. S. C.

The Soul Strengthened by Trouble

FRIDAY, October 1. Thessalonians 2: 1-12. "Our gathering together unto Him." How greatly the apostle loved and longed for these Thessalonian believers, is obvious from his first Epistle. He says he endeavored exceedingly to see them, with great desire, but Satan hindered. In this phrase, he seems to be solacing himself with the thought that even if they could not meet on earth, there would be before long a great gathering around the person of the Lord Jesus, when the scattered members of God's great family would come together.

This phrase seems to be the necessary climax of two others. In Acts 2: 44 we learn that all the recently converted members of the mother church at Jerusalem were together in the blessed and helpful fellowship of the apostles and others at Jerusalem; and we can well understand what that vast host must have meant in inspiration, sympathy, and mutual helpfulness. No one could have felt lonely or neglected who was able to reckon himself a member of those gatherings in the temple cloisters, or in some dimpling valley of the Mount of Olives, or at the Holy Communion celebrated from house to house. However, in Acts 8: 2 we learn that they were "all scattered abroad," except the apostles. On the very day that Stephen died, the storm burst on the Church, and before night fell the believers were in hiding or had fled. It could not be otherwise. To have enjoyed those privileges always would have enervated them and made them too dependent on the apostles, the temple, and the generosity of their fellow members. They must be driven forth as Adam from Paradise. But here we have the Church gathered and once more together. How much richer and nobler the members must have become by their experiences; much as young soldiers who have become seasoned and experienced in the war, and return home as veterans. "These are they who came out of great tribulation." F. B. M.

How We May Lose the "I" in the "Thou"

SATURDAY, October 2. Luke 9: 23. "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily, and follow me." A bishop once said in a sermon to workmen, "My figure denotes the capital 'I.' It is only as I stretch wide my arms that the capital 'I' becomes a 'T,' standing for 'Thee, my Lord, and for Those who Thou hast given me,' that I may minister unto them."

Christ thus stretched out his everlasting arms of love for all humanity; his personal "I" making the "T" of Calvary's cross, meaning to all men, "Thou art mine; only let me be thine."

"I gave my life for thee;
What hast thou given for me?"

The surrender of self to be crucified with Christ is the only way to true possession of self. Then, "none of us liveth unto himself," but all for others. We lose the "I" in the "Thou." Deny self, die to self, live to Christ and humanity, and you have your own true self—self-respect, self-reliance, self-defense, self-sacrifice—a purified and ennobled self, like him who gave himself for men.

Then take up your cross, spread out your hands, count all as loss for Him who gave himself for you. Count all as friends who are in the family of God, and all will be yours, and you will be Christ's, as Christ is God's. E. W. C.

Vanishing Ideals

AT the beginning of the great war, there was one ideal bright, noble, refulgent—which lifted itself like a shining pillar of fire before the eyes of Americans. We would observe toward all nations alike the attitude of a friend, and when the auspicious moment came, we would endeavor to win them back to the paths of peace. It was an attitude that gave promise of an opportunity for real service to the world, and to which our people as a whole gave most cordial assent. Peace was the dominant thought in all minds, and as the war progressed and its sufferings became appalling, we felt that there was hardly any sacrifice on our part that would not have been made, if by so doing we might put an end to the indescribable horror and restore peace to the world.

Then there came a change. In the hour when the traffic in war munitions began, we lost touch with our ideal. There were thousands who had the clearness of vision to perceive this; and when the traffic took on astounding proportions and huge cargoes of war material were crossing the Atlantic at short intervals, they felt the conviction that nothing but bitterness and regret could come of it. Protected by law, it was still a business that could not be regarded by Christian people with the smallest degree of tolerance. It has been a thorn in the side of this nation ever since it started, and it is undeniable that the greater part of our troubles in the war can be traced straight to this source. In innumerable American hearts today there is a deep and lasting regret that we ever sent to any power whatsoever the means of prolonging the destructive conflict.

And this is the cloud that obscures our high ideal. We plead with God for the world's redemption and that the struggle in Europe may be followed by the dawn of a better day. We sympathize with the nations in their affliction; we send missions of mercy and messengers with words of peace and goodwill on their lips. Yet we fan the flame into a greater conflagration.

It is a lamentable confession to make that we have lost our ideal. And the saddest part of it is that it is true.

A Time to Practice Thrift

IN seasons of temporary prosperity, augmented incomes travel side by side with a corresponding increase in expenditures. Thrift is not a national trait of the average American, and in this single fact may be found the secret of many a failure. It is easier to spend than to save, and far easier to multiply our needs and gratify them than to reduce and restrain them. The man who spends liberally and often heedlessly finds saving a difficult task; and so he usually travels along the easy road, until the turn is reached—as it nearly always is at some time in one's life—when a sudden drop in income, from business or other causes, finds him resourceless and embittered by vain regrets over his own folly in not saving when he had the opportunity.

These observations are timely, when we look at the abnormally prosperous conditions that now obtain in business—conditions that will not continue indefinitely. The war abroad and the consequent disarrangement of manufacturing and business conditions are driving the trade of the world to the United States more than to any other country. The increased exports of agricultural and manufacturing products, entirely aside from the tremendous output of ammunition, are making themselves felt, and the American laborer is not only asking for a fair share of the profits coming from this highly stimulated business in all branches, but is being granted his demands in the way of higher wages. For the American workman this is all well and good, so long as these abnormal conditions last; but what will it be when we get back to the normal and subnormal, so far as our export business in its various branches is concerned? That it will be subnormal soon after the close of hostilities (which is sure to come, whether it be this year or within three or five years) goes without saying.

There must come a time when the workers of the countries now at war will return to their benches, and nothing that skill and inventive genius and hard work can do to win back the trade and commerce that were suddenly brought to a standstill during the time of the war and diverted to America, will be left undone. When that time comes, the competition of our long-established industries, as well as those that have sprung up since the beginning of the war, will be tremendous. It requires no mathematical genius to demonstrate that inflated wages will have to return to normal, and possibly to what would be regarded at the present time as subnormal.

It would be wise, therefore, for our citizens to take thought for the future, while the stream of prosperity is at the flood. Their present surplus earnings should be regarded in the light of extras, to be put aside as a provision against the time—which is sure to come—when they will be needed. If they do this, instead of yielding to the temptation to raise their standard of living to the level of the high wages they are now earning because of the general trade expansion brought about by the war, they will be taking a wise and provident step, the true value of which will be appreciated hereafter when, with the bursting of the bubble, everything seeks its normal channel, wages included.

Without Vision

IN a recent article in the Saturday Evening Post, Reginald Wright Kauffman reviewed what he considers to be the collapse of the International Socialist movement and gives as his reason for this apparent failure the fact that the Socialist movement in the various countries involved lacked the spiritual element. Their economic theory was based upon the materialistic philosophy, and so, because there was no spiritual vision, no spiritual faith, no profound spiritual conviction, the men surrendered their professed theories and succumbed to the contagion of war. There were before the war 8,000,000 Socialists in the countries now at strife. What might have happened if these 8,000,000 men had had sufficient cohesion and stability to stand out solidly against the war? Many of them would doubtless have been killed, but who can guess what results might have been gained from such a sacrifice? Multitudes of them have already perished in the gigantic slaughter. How much better it would have been for them to have died for their faith in peace, rather than to die for their faith in war!

Long ago the prophet said: "Where there is no vision the people perish." Any movement that lacks the power which comes from spiritual conviction, spiritual vision, is doomed to failure. The Socialists, like the church, seem to have lost their supreme opportunity in the crisis of last year. The horrible catastrophe that has resulted forms a terrific appeal to all religionists and all reformers to keep the soul open for heavenly light, and to be obedient to the heavenly visions.

After these black days of chaos there will come an hour for reconstruction, reorganization, revivification. That glad, gigantic task of laying the foundations for a new order of society will be put into the hands of men who have seen visions and dreamed dreams. So shall the city of God come down from heaven to exist among men.

The Opulent Harvest

THIS year establishes a record yield in the chief farm products of the country. God has been good to us beyond all our expectations, and far exceeding our deserts. The government crop report, issued on September 8, based on a personal canvass by thousands of agents of the Agricultural Department, makes a remarkable showing. Wheat will yield over 981,000,000 bushels, or 90,000,000 more than the crop of 1914, which was itself a record-breaker. It is expected that, when the final canvass is made, the entire wheat crop of the country will reach the maximum which was predicted early in the season—a billion bushels! Corn also makes a noble showing, with 2,895,000,000 bushels, or over 110,000,000 more than last year. Oats will yield 1,400,000,000 bushels, a gain of 267,000,000 over 1914. Rye, barley, sweet potatoes, rice and hay are all record-breakers, while apples and peaches are far above the average. Not only have our fertile fields yielded food sufficient for all of our own domestic needs, but enough to supply the demands of other lands.

It is to the hard-working, intelligent farmer, who keeps abreast with the newest methods in practical agriculture, that the nation looks for a solid foundation on which to build prosperity. On his energy and success depend the stability of almost every kind of business. On his crops depend for employment not only the big army of workers he hires in harvest, but to a very large extent the workers on the railroads, the transportation lines and in a host of other businesses. He is the primal citizen, the nation's provider, the energizer of commerce, the backbone of economic progress; for "the farmer feeds them."

When the Hebrew psalmist extolled the abundance and goodness of God, he reached the climax of his enumeration of earthly blessings when he said: "Thou enticest thine hand, and satisfiest the desire of every living thing." Our joy over the magnificent harvest tinged with sadness, however, when we remember that there are many lands in which there is little or no harvest festival this year. We should be thankful that it is in our power to supply their needs.

Concerning Sacrifice

THE following thoughtful letter deserves earnest consideration and a most careful answer.

Can we really call ourselves consecrated to God's service if we have denied ourselves and followed him when we had as much as we could get? I mean when we do not give up all our pleasures of living, all our money, and go out as Christ did, without anything for ourselves. He denied himself all home, money, pleasures, and lived only for others. We marry, set up homes, choose our vocations, make money, and, generally speaking, most of us have all the comforts of life and a few of us (ministers included) luxuries, just like all the rest of the world. Can we call this service? Is it not more truly our own, for these are the things we love to do, and call for no denial on our part. Of course now that our salvation does not depend on the things we do, or let up, but sometimes when I remember that the world is full of needy people I find it hard to enjoy anything purchased for self, any entertainment, no matter how innocent. We are Christians by his grace, but are we disciples? We know in a general way the prosperity, comforts and pleasures do not tend to make us spiritual. Should the Christian for this reason deny himself and give these things up, or should he accept them as gifts from God, asking him that we may not grow selfish with them and that he will say how to use them?"

It is too bad that while the vast majority of Christians do not go far enough in such thinking, there are occasionally found who go too far. This respondent does well to think of the world's needs; people; he is right in feeling that he ought to do so, but he can to help them. But he is wrong in thinking that there is any intrinsic spiritual value in denying ourselves the comforts of life, that is, when we deny ourselves for a selfish spiritual purpose. He is also wrong in thinking that love, marriage, home, even vocations, are essentially selfish.

The whole matter is cleared up by realizing the simple purpose of every individual human life, which is, undoubtedly, to help every other human being. It touches. Giving himself to God for the service of humanity, a man should keep himself at the highest possible standard of efficiency. Love, home, God, work, pleasure, recreation—all these things have a place in the great drive of his life—to put himself at his best for the sake of God and his neighbor.

This friend errs in saying that Christ denied himself all pleasure. He went to feasts, and doubtless enjoyed them. He was so far from being an ascetic that his enemies dared to call him a "gluttonous man and a wine-bibber." But through all his pleasures, as through all his pain, there was the thought of helping and gladdening others. God "gives us richly all things to enjoy." Above all he wants us to be glad—and if we fail to be glad we are by just as much spoiling his plan of universal gladness.

Finally, what is needed just now is not so much individual cases of petty self-denials as a brave, insistent protest against the upside-down position of society in general. There are deeper causes for the world-wide want than the personal indulgences of Christians, though these have helped to produce it and are truly helping to perpetuate it. But the chief social duty of the Christian today is to find the fundamental economic causes of want and seek to remove them.

We must deny ourselves—we shall deny ourselves when we catch the great vision of the world's need, when we understand the Saviour's compassion. Here and there one finds a Christian so touched with the compassion of Jesus that it is a greater sacrifice for him to keep and use his daily supplies than to give them away. We must enter into the stress of Christ's desire to bring to humanity not only soul salvation and an immortal hope, but the common blessing of daily life, which are uncommon still to half the world.

Our readers will find on various pages of this issue mention of a new and delightful serial, "Amarilly of Clothes-Line Alley," which will begin in the Christian Herald of October 6. We want everybody to know this wonderful young American, and to enjoy the recital of her adventures from week to week. It is an opportunity to do a little missionary work by informing our friends, so that they may share your pleasure from the very first instalment.

Greatest Hospital on Earth

CINCINNATI, Ohio, now claims the honor of possessing the largest and most perfectly equipped hospital on earth. It is situated in the suburb of Mount Auburn, away from the city's smoke and noise. There are twenty-seven buildings already occupied, and others will be added as the city expands. There are forty-five wards now in use, with nine hundred beds. There are six hundred men and women in white and khaki uniforms employed in the building, and all living within its precincts. Every arrangement is complete, even to the toy for children, and field sports in the hospital park for the restoration of convalescents. A commission of physicians took a whole year to get the good points from the best hospitals of the world, and then took four more years to build the great institution. It is a city institution, built with municipal money, and cost four million dollars. The sick mechanic unable to pay his rent and the poor drunkard who faints in a gutter, will have as competent and careful medical and surgical treatment as the most prominent individual. When God-blessed institutions these hospitals are! The past did not know about them. Babylon had fabulous wealth, but not a penny for a benevolent institution. Egypt could build the pyramids, tombs for kings, but did not dream of a hospital for the bodies or minds of people. Greece had a culture and literature still the wonder of the world, but Athens never had a place in her architecture for such an institution as the Cincinnati Hospital. Rome could build a Forum, and lay down laws to govern the centuries, but she never dreamed of homes for helpless old people, or children, or the suffering and sick. It was the Christ who brought into the world the royal law of love, and taught men how to put it in practical shape in organized public charities. Ouraviour is pleased with institutions organized to care for his poor and his sick. In his ministry on earth he laid great emphasis on curing the bodies and minds as well as the souls of men. This is an illustration: "And his fame went throughout all Syria; and they brought unto him all sick people that were taken with divers diseases and torments, and those which were possessed with evils, and those which were lunatic, and those that had the palsy; and he healed them." (Matt. 4: 24.)

Motto on His Breast

An English soldier boy was picked up on a battlefield wounded, and on exposing his bosom he found pricked with a needle in his ink this motto: "For the King." The motto pricked into the skin, which could never be effaced, represented the life on for his King deeper down than the skin, in the center of his soul. This is a motto of the average soldier in the great contest in loyalty to the Czar, Kaiser, King or ruler, and the nation he represents, and which is stronger than life itself. They are the type of the real soldier of the Cross, who wears the motto, "For the King," wrought into his heart, and would, if need be, gladly lay down his life as an evidence of that loyalty. In olden times the master put a brand on his slaves to identify them. Paul makes use of the custom to illustrate his complete ownership of the soul of the believer by Christ. The apostle not only wore the motto "For the King" in his breast, but the badge of service to Christ which he counted such an honor in the brand of the cross that was burned into his soul. This brand of the slave is the royal decoration thus referred to: "I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus." (Gal. 6: 17.)

Age 106—Weight 24 Pounds

MRS. JEANETTE SCHWARTZ, 106 years old, who weighed only twenty-four pounds and was but three feet high, died the other night in the Hebrew Home for the Aged in Brooklyn. She was a woman of excellent habits and character. Length of days and size or weight of body have little to do with the highest manhood and womanhood.

complex civilization the people of the various nations have rushed to the cities. They have done so in a remarkable manner in our land, the last half century especially. Gold, gold, the people run after that and the things that it will buy. Fortunately the mental and moral progress of the cities has in many instances kept pace with their material growth. It is to be hoped that the new city which has arisen so marvelously may continue to grow permanently, happily and usefully. The city where the people gather is to the rescue, but were too late. The sister in her desperation threw her arm about her brother's neck and dragged him down. The men in diving found them on the bottom, fifteen feet down, in each other's arms. They resuscitated Mabel, but Stanley could not be restored to life. The little hero gave his life to save his sister. He might have lived fifty years of a useful life too, and not done as much as in the one tragical moment when he became a martyr to his love for his sister. Little Stanley imitated the Christ of whom it was said truthfully: "He saved others; himself he cannot save." (Matt. 27: 12.)

Beavers and Irrigation

"WORKING like a beaver," to indicate the most diligent industry, is a proper phrase, for beavers are the symbols of industry among animals. The beaver, like the bee, is not only industrious, but is also quite intelligent. He is a good carpenter, sawing down the trees with his teeth and cutting them into proper lengths for his house or for food. He is a good mason, applying the mortar with his tail. Attention is now being called to his engineering talent in building dams, storing water and promoting the cause of irrigation in the West. It is said that for this reason the United States Government is to give the beaver special protection. Engineers are taking lessons from the beavers. The men can construct dams and ditches, but must rely on nature for the constant supply of water. A large colony of these animal engineers have built dams at the source of the Rio San Antonio in the Carson National Forest in New Mexico, and have collected water enough in their lakes to irrigate several thousand acres of land. The beaver in his extensive storage of water, now to be used for irrigation purposes by the farmer, and man's irrigation plans and successes, suggest these words of prophecy: "I will open rivers in high places, and fountains in the midst of the valleys; I will make the wilderness a pool of water, and the dry land springs of water." (Isa. 41: 18.)

Jewelers' Exhibition

THERE was held recently at the Grand Central Palace in New York an exhibition under the auspices of the American National Retail Jewelers' Association. There were 500 delegates present, representing 6,000 jewelers. There was a most gorgeous display of gems and jewelers' articles, and the program included some of the ablest speakers in the country, who discussed subjects of intense practical interest to the trade, from the supply of the diamond mines to the utility of the tiny watch upon the wrist. Perhaps the most spectacular feature of the exhibition was that of Miss Catharine Thompson, a statuesque artist's model, adorned with three hundred and twenty thousand dollars' worth of gems. The top piece was worth $65,000, the Dutch collar, $10,000, the corsage, $50,000, a ring, $15,000, several bracelets, $10,000, and a belt, $25,000. Other gems worn brought up the amount to $320,000. God made jewels. He flashed into them the rays of beauty out of his own mind for man's delight. They have too often expressed empty vanity or sinful luxury. This business was thrifty among Jews of old. There is this reference to the jewelry of one of the Jewish kings: "Hezekiah had exceeding much riches and honor; and he made himself treasures for silver, and for gold, and for precious stones, and for spices, and for shells, and for all manner of pleasant jewels." (II Chron. 32: 27.)

Longfellow's Home Becomes a Public Shrine

THE will of Mrs. Richard H. Dana (Edith Longfellow Dana), which has been filed in the Middlesex Probate Court, discloses the fact that Craigie House in Brattle Street, Cambridge, Mass., the home of Mrs. Dana's distinguished father, Henry W. Longfellow, is to be preserved for the public. According to a deed of trust made more than a year ago by the then heirs of the poet, the house was deeded to three trustees "to be held, preserved, maintained and managed for the benefit of the public as a specimen of the best colonial architecture of the eighteenth century, as a historical monument of the occupation of the house by George Washington during the siege of Boston in the Revolutionary War, and as a memorial to Henry W. Longfellow." The trustees are J. F. Moore, of Boston, E. M. Parker, of Cambridge, and D. L. Pickman, Jr., of Boston; and they hold a sum of money sufficient to keep the homestead in repair and to pay the insurance and taxes. Besides Mrs. Dana, the heirs who signed the deed are Miss Alice Longfellow, who now occupies the mansion, and Mrs. J. G. Thorp (Allegria Longfellow), both daughters of the poet; and Ernest W. Longfellow, a son of the poet. This gift of the Longfellow home is a priceless treasure. It was a beautiful thing for these children, whose lovely faces in one photograph were familiar to the people of two generations ago, to dedicate this house to the public. The Cavalier reads the courtship of Miles Standish with as much pleasure today as the Puritan does; and "Why don't you speak for yourself, John?" is familiar to almost every school child. "Evangeline," the tale of the French exiles of Acadia, is still read in all languages and lands; "Hiawatha," where the poet's genius is perhaps best expressed, continues to charm the public with the story of American Indian life; "The Building of the Ship" and a hundred other poems are a part of the priceless legacy to the thought, heart and life of the nation. Longfellow was a clean man, a good man through and through. He sang sweetly of the best things of this life, and of the better life. The Memorial is a suggestion of the earthly and heavenly immortality which the poet announced in these lines:

"Life is real, life is earnest,
And the grave is not its goal,
Dust thou art, to dust returnest,
Was not written of the soul."

The sacred shrine will continue to preach a sermon to all generations from this text: "He being dead, yet speaketh." (Heb. 11: 19.)

which consist in growth of mind and soul, thus referred to: "Till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ." (Eph. 4: 13.)

Alaskan City's Quick Growth

THE new railroad construction terminus at Anchorage, Alaska, a wilderness six months ago, has today grown to a city of 5,000 population. Commissioner Tallman of the General Land Office reports the sale of several hundred lots by the government. The site is one of the termini of the new government railroad from Seward to Fairbanks. In the highest and most used as a type of heaven. "For he looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God." (Heb. 11: 10.)

Boy Drowns for Sister

TWELVE-YEAR-OLD Stanley Hewitt of Coney Island gave his life to save that of his sister Mabel, eight years old, the other afternoon. While the two were bathing at the foot of Ocean Parkway, Mabel, who could not swim, slipped into deep water and came up crying for help. Stanley immediately leaped in and held her up, calling loudly for help. John Blake and Joseph Benbocht, who were nearly a quarter of a mile away, hearing the boy's cry ran

ONE of the most important things in the present busy world is time. How to find the time to do the many things we ought to do and the many other things that are expected of us is one of the greatest problems of our day. This is particularly true of the pastor-preacher who serves a large congregation.

Dr. James L. Gardiner, pastor of St. Paul's Memorial M. E. Church, South Bend, Ind., comes forward with an interesting statement about the time he has saved by the use of an automobile. Some people are inclined to question a minister's right to the luxury of an automobile, but Dr. Gardiner classes his car as a tool for his work rather than a toy for his pleasure.

When he first invested in an automobile he was pastor of a down-town city church that ministered to a large constituency. The members and friends of this church lived in almost every section of the city, while many resided in the surrounding communities. This fact made the task of proper pastoral visitation unusually heavy. Dr. Gardiner soon found, however, that the automobile not only helped take away much of the burden of this pastoral work, but was a great saver of time, as it took at the most but a few minutes to drive from any one home to any other in the church.

During the past two years he has been pastor of a church located in a residential district; nevertheless it too has members scattered throughout the city and the surrounding territory. To reach them and the many others who call this church their home, and to visit from week to week the sick in the various hospitals, is no easy task. Here, too, he has found the automobile most valuable as a burden-lifter and as a time-saver.

He declares that the automobile is coming more and more to be almost a necessity to the busy pastor in his work. With the increasing activities of the modern church and the many demands from within and without that are being made upon a minister's time, the labor of pastoral visitation grows heavier and heavier. In many cities and towns the street car service is more or less unreliable, and consequently much valuable time is lost "waiting for the trolley." Then again in any villages, towns and rural communities there are no car lines, and therefore it is impossible through this medium to reach the homes of the people. He believes the automobile to be a splendid investment to the preacher who would economize time, and thinks the car is not far distant when churches as well as ministers will appreciate this. It is quite possible Dr. Gardiner believes that the churches themselves will soon be providing autos for the use of pastors, just as they now provide them with homes to live in.

He suggests also that the automobile may be of service to the minister who spends some of his time in the lecture field. During the past three months Dr. Gardiner has driven to a number of towns and cities in Indiana to lecture or give high school commencement addresses. In nearly every case he made better time than he could have made by train. On some occasions he would have lost several hours waiting for proper connections. Then again, where the distance was not too great, he drove home the same evening, whereas if he had depended upon the train he would have been compelled to wait until the next day.

Dr. Gardiner has driven his machine during the present season over 700 miles, and has had no repair expense, other than to tires. With a Studebaker he has confidence that he will not only economize time, but that he will accomplish his appointments on time.

Her Highness By OWEN OLIVER

JOY'S people—and other people—thought that it was very foolish to be so much in love; but Joy thought that it was "very nice." That was how she spoke of it to them when they teased her; but when she spoke to herself she called her love "a glory."

She often wondered that a clever, handsome, wealthy man of the world, who might have married a grand lady, should choose "such an ordinary girl." Her one fear was that some day he might wake up from his dream, and notice that she was "only just like anybody else." Joy had never had much conceit of herself, and she could not realize that the features she criticized one by one before her mirror, as a whole made up "a face like a flower," as he had told her. She had still less notion that her little tendernesses and sweetnesses and foolishnesses made up a very worshipful woman. The idea that she could influence "His Highness"—that was her name for her lover—in any of the big concerns of life had never entered her head. He had gone away for a few days about one of his big "deals," and there was a great commotion in the town over some "combine" that he had proposed in his masterful manner just before he left. "You can think over it, and we'll discuss it when I come back," he had told them. And the more they thought over it the less they liked it.

"I don't know, Joy," her father said, "whether Bryant has spoken to you about this amalgamation that he proposes—"

"Why, no, daddy!" she disclaimed. "He wouldn't worry my silly head with business. He'd be afraid to let me talk about it, for fear he'd find out how stupid I am."

"You aren't so stupid as you think," her father assured her; "and I consider you ought to know about this. He wants to force a dozen houses—ours among them—into a syndicate with him. Under the arrangements he put forward he would have the control of the whole thing."

"So he ought to have!" Joy asserted. "He's fifty times cleverer than everybody else."

"Umph!" Her father took a long breath. "He's clever enough. That's the strongest reason against it. He'd take the lion's share."

Joy laughed.

"Being a lion!" she said. One of her soft hands wandered to the locket at her neck, where a portrait of "His Highness" was enshrined.

"I was thinking of the lambs," her father remarked drily. "Of course I don't suppose he'd eat his future father-in-law. Perhaps he'd even offer me a few lamb bones! But I'm not carnivorous; not a cannibal anyhow! They're people I've dealt with all my life; and I can't shut my eyes to the fact that the combine will be a bad thing for the rest of them; and for the town."

"Then why amalgamate, daddy? That's the right word, isn't it? I suppose Harvey can't make people, if they don't want to."

Her father shook his head.

"You don't understand, child. We are competitors at present; and he is bigger than all the rest of us, and has far more capital at his back. He could afford to lose more than all we have—and he'd do it—to undersell us and squeeze us out, if we didn't accept his terms. They are hard terms, Joy. I dare say he'd tell you it was all in the way of business, if you asked him, but—"

"But I shouldn't!" Joy cried in horror. "He might think I didn't trust him! I expect he'd be—not angry, only— Anyway, Harvey is sure to do what is right. I know him."

Her mother was the next to broach the subject. She approached it from a different position.

"I used to say that you hadn't a scrap of sentiment, Joy," she observed, "but it seems that I was wrong."

Joy played with her locket. She never forgot that Bryant's portrait was inside all the time he was away; and not often at other times, unless the original was with her.

"It seems so, mummy," she confessed. "Well, I'm glad. Aren't you?"

"Sentiment is a very good thing, if you can keep it; but, if it becomes too one-sided, the sentimental one is likely to suffer, Joy. A woman ought to have some influence over her future husband."

"In some things," Joy agreed.

"In all things," her mother corrected firmly; "well, all questions of right and wrong. To my mind this 'combine' that he's trying to force all the firms into is monstrous."

"Mother!" Gentle little Joy seemed to bristle.

"If you would take the trouble to understand it—your father could enlighten you much better than I and form your own judgment—"

"I don't want to understand it," Joy declared quickly. "It would seem as if I thought it necessary to judge Harvey; and I am quite sure that he will only do what is right."

"He would be more sure to do it if you had more influence with him."

"The influence I am going to have with him is that I leave it to his honor—and love—to do right by the girl who loves and trusts him. I don't mind who knows. I do!"

Her mother sighed.

"He is years older than you," she said; "and sometimes I wish that you weren't marrying him. Of course it is a splendid marriage from a worldly point of view, but if you have no influence over Harvey now, you won't have much when you are married, Joy."

Her brother spoke to her an hour later. "I don't want to say anything against Bryant," he began.

"You'd better not!" she cried, and dropped her book and sat bolt upright.

Her brother stood looking down at her and grinning.

"If you were six inches taller," he said, "and half a waist-belt bigger round, you'd be a majestic person, Midget. No, I'm not going to attack 'His Highness,' so you needn't get your claws out. He's a white man; but, Joy, this combine's going to hit people hard."

"Then it's their fault, not his."

Joy's gentle mouth set firmly.

"It isn't only the manufacturers. There are the clerks. You see, if he amalgamates offices—"

"It will be because offices want amalgamating. I'm not going to discuss it. What Harvey does is sure to be right, Stewart."

Stewart whistled and pulled at his mustache. Presently he patted his sister's shoulder in the affectionate way that gave him a power over her which no one else had till her lover came and love snatched them both up in a whirlwind.

"Some people wonder what he sees in you," he remarked. "Now I don't! I don't altogether wonder that you like him, either. I think better of Bryant than most people do, Joy girl!"

"Thank you! Nice old Stewart!"

"But there was never a man who didn't need a little influence to keep him from running business—perfectly legitimate and straight business—a trifle too hard sometimes. Any low is liable to see his own side of the case in a brighter light than he sees her people's."

"Well, Harvey's sure to see both sides better than I do. He wouldn't let me influence him against his own judgment; not in business things, any way."

"I think he would, even in business, funny little Sis. If you'd let me explain the affair to you—"

"No, no, no! It would be disloyal to Harvey even to listen. You wouldn't listen to a word against Maud, Stuart; not a word that implied that she'd been considering! I won't! There! let's go and call for her; shall we?"

They went out and called upon her brother's fiancée; and Joy slipped off and left them in their "Gard of Eden;" four shrubs with a seat between, hidden from view. (Maud wouldn't have the shrubs cut!) She met late Royce, who was at school with her and recently engaged to Teddy Mills and Kate caught her by the arm.

"Oh, Joy!" she said. "Teddy's so worried about this combine. Every one says they'll amalgamate offices and reduce; and he's quite a junior. He had to go he might be out of a bet till he'd spent all he has put by; and it would be years and years before we could save enough for our house and— You'll be able to marry him, I suppose?"

"Next spring," Joy owned. She held her locket; flushed and smiled.

"You've grown prettier, Joy," Kate remarked. "I'm worrying myself to a fright."

"Oh, no, dear!"

"I am; and it's all over this syndicate or combine or whatever they call it. Nobody wants it, but our Mr. Bryant is forcing it on them."

"And it isn't only Teddy, Joy. There's my father, and my brothers; dozens of the boys that you and I knew. They're all expecting to be the ones to lose their jobs. It will ruin the place, if it comes off; and they daren't oppose him. He's just going to squeeze the money out of their pockets into his, and—"

"You forget that I am engaged to him!" Joy cried. "Perhaps you do not know the reason that I am! I love him; and I trust him. You have heard a lot of wicked falsehoods!"

"Don't be angry, Joy," her friend pleaded. "I don't mean that he is im-anything that he hasn't a right to do, or that he wants to hurt people. He just can't realize what it means to us. Couldn't you make Mr. Bryant understand and influence him not to do such a wicked thing?"

"He does not need my influence to make him do whatever a kind and honorable man should," Joy said firmly. "I am not angry; but I absolutely trust him. Good-by, Kate."

She walked on with her head in the air. When she came to a quiet corner of the park she opened the locket and kissed the portrait of a stern-faced man, many years her senior.

Her uncle and the doctor stopped her on her way home, and they also alluded to the combine.

"I cannot discuss Harvey's business affairs with anybody," she told them, "not even with such dear friends as you; except to say that whatever he does will certainly be right."

"I shall refuse to talk about the 'combine' with anyone in future," she told her mother. "I shall try not to be rude to them; but I am getting angry. Other people don't know Harvey; and so do I!"

She avoided discussion—and rudeness—with a number of people; but she could not get away from three of them. Mrs. Mills, her father's old foreman, and the band of her old nurse, came the next day to beg a few words with Miss Joy.

"I'm not speaking against him, Missie. It's just 'business' to Mr. Bryant. He sees a way of making something out of the power his money gives him, and 'Why not?' he says. No reason why not, as far as he's concerned; but it will be just ruin to some of our working folk. It's like this, you see—"

"Please don't, Mills!" she cried. "I don't discuss it. Really I can't. I shall tell Mr. Bryant that you are a dear old friend, and I want him to see that you always have a good place. But I cannot presume to criticize his business plans. He is so very, very many times wiser than I. I do not even understand what the 'combine' is exactly; but I am quite sure that whatever he does will be right."

"Even if it means people thrown out of work and leaving the place where they were born and bred?" Mills demanded bitterly.

"Even then," Joy said steadily, "though her lips were white. "But I don't believe it will be like that."

The minister came to tea, and asked afterwards for a few minutes' talk with Joy. He was no judge of business, he declared, and only a servant of the edge of men. Mr. Bryant would certainly do nothing that was not honest and honorable and allowable in business; but perhaps if it were pointed out to him that a course quite within his rights might, nevertheless, cause great loss and hardship to a large number of worthy people, and injure the town where "his little sweetheart whom we all love" was born and bred, he might feel disposed to chivalrously forego "some of the things which are due to Caesar." If Joy would influence him—?

"No, no!" she cried. "I know nothing of business. I cannot think it necessary for me to interfere. He will do what is chivalrous without any word from me. Nothing would induce me to let him by the suggestion that I do not entirely trust him. You see, I—"

When the minister had gone, and Joy had finished a cry, she sat down in her dainty little room, with the open locket perched on the inkstand, and wrote to her lover.

"My dear Highness," she began, and she wrote eight closely filled pages telling him how high he was to her; and how very, very dear; but there was not a word about the combine from beginning to end.

He came home the following afternoon to the meeting to discuss the 'combine.' He wired to Joy, "Train very late. Must go straight to Town Hill. Will come to you immediately after."

Joy put on a fresh white gown and waited impatiently in the drawing-room, peeping round the blind at every vicine. A taxi stopped at their door at last, but it was only her brother, back from the meeting. He rushed into the room, picked his sister up like a baby and kissed her.

"Joy!" he shouted. "I take off my hat to Bryant! He's a white man! A good man! . . . They all took off their hats and cheered him at the finish of the meeting. He hasn't squeezed anybody. No terms could be fairer, and things will hum with him at the head. Talk of reductions! We shall have to import men! He's going to make the place. You're a lucky girl, you—you Midget!"

"I knew I was," Joy said; "but I'm glad everybody else knows it too! Did he look quite well?"

"You'll know in a minute," her brother told her. "Here's his car!"

The lovers met upon the stairs, the staid financier running up and his girlish sweetheart running down. It was some time before they talked any sense, and then—

"I'm so proud, proud, proud of you, Highness!" the girl said adoringly; and the strong man held her back a little way and looked thoughtfully at her sweet face.

"About the combine?" he asked.

"Yes. They wanted me to write to you about it, Highness! And tell you what to do! Wouldn't you have laughed at me!"

"Well, girly, I might have laughed at what you told me to do." He touched her cheek.

"Would you have been angry?"

"No darling. I'd like to know your opinion about anything."

"You're laughing at me! Yes, you are—Let me look? Why, you're ever so serious, Harvey, dear. You don't think I ever doubted you? Of course I told them that it would be absurd of me to advise such a clever man; and disloyal to dream that you needed any word from me to do just what was the best and kindest thing—"

"Oh, my dear!"

"And I wasn't disloyal in my heart either. I knew you would do it—"

"Joy, darling—"

"And you have! Of your own accord! Dear Highness! . . . Aren't you glad that I trusted you too much to put a word in my letters to influence you?"

The stern-looking financier kissed the girl with a suddenness which made her give a laughing, pleased cry.

"You did, Joy," he said, taking both her hands in his. "You put in three words."

The girl looked up at him in utter astonishment.

"Three words?" she asked. "Three words?"

"My Dear Highness," he quoted very gravely. "Three words that will influence me all my life. Sweet little worshiper!"

His eyes flickered, and the girl kissed him gently, which she rarely did unasked.

"So I will tell you of the big influence that you had in this. . . I did not intend to be so brutal as people supposed. In the terms which I had drafted I took power to decide everything; but I did not intend to use the power unmercifully. Still I meant to be 'businesslike,' as I called it. The terms which I conceded to-day are better for the 'combine' as a whole; and certainly better for their employees; but they are not profitable for me personally. I wrote this fresh draft this morning, after I had your letter. They are your terms, Joy; the gift that you give to the town where you were born, and where you are loved."

"Because I called you 'My Dear Highness!' Oh! You are!"

"I would be nothing less. Only a prince should win my princess."

"Such a very silly little princess! But a loving one."

"And a loved one. . . The old draft was before me, on my desk, and I held your letter in my hand. 'My Dear Highness,' I read again and again; and I tore up the old terms. 'Her Highness shall do no unprincely deed,' I said. . . No prince ever, Joy; but, for your faith in me higher than the man I should have been!"

The stern face quivered; and the girl drew it close to her soft shoulder, as if she mothered the strong man.

"Oh!" she cried. "My dear Highness."

the confidence of the army was withdrawn from him, which meant a corresponding accession of strength to the party of the Czar, and also meant inevitably what has taken place, the fall of the Grand Duke.

It has been a puzzle to practically all military writers since the beginning of the war, as to why in the first place the Grand Duke was given the position of commander-in-chief, except for the fact that he was the political leader of the so-called military party, as there was nothing in his career which indicated that he was possessed of the qualities and abilities necessary for the incumbency of so important a post. In the Russo-Japanese war he had first commanded a brigade, then a division, with no particular distinction, and thereafter held the post of commander of the first, the Petrograd Military Conscription, a position of more social and political than military importance.

During the week there was great activity by the airmen of all the combatants. The French raided Karlsruhe in Baden and Freiburg in Bresau, and attacked various military storehouses and depots in Belgium and Germany, well behind the battle lines. The British made an air raid on the German submarine bases on the Belgian coast. The Germans made three raids on London itself and its suburbs, and also on Nancy, toward the eastern end of the battle line, in France.

Foreign exchange was extremely erratic during the past week, and violent rises and falls were the rule. Sterling varied from 4.55 to 4.70, closing at 4.65, while francs and marks were almost equally irregular in their quotations.

None of the minor campaigns contributed much to the total of the week's doings. In the Russo-Turkish campaign in the Caucasus there has been some activity around Olty, but of no particular importance. In Central Persia, too, the Russians and Turks came into collision and there the Russians gained some ground. In the Persian Gulf campaign between the British and the Turks there was some fighting, but the British seem to have reached a position from which they do not care to advance further inland and appear satisfied to hold their rather large gains.

From South Africa the news reaches us that General Botha and a force of the Union of South Africa troops will soon make their appearance on the European battlefields, and we are further informed that Canada, Australia and New Zealand expect materially to increase the number of their troops operating on the western battle line and in the Dardanelles, almost at once.

The events in the campaign in the west this week have been peculiar. From one end of the line to the other there have been incessant artillery attacks by the French on the German positions, never followed by any infantry advance. Sometimes this attack has been replied to by the German artillery, but more often not, though at the extreme end of the week the Germans launched an attack on the French positions in the Argonne.

The principal points at which the French made this artillery attack were in the Arras region, where there was such severe fighting last spring, near Roye at the elbow in the battle line where it approaches most closely to Paris, in the Champagne district and in the Vosges and in Alsace.

What this severe and general cannonading is a prelude to, is difficult to say. There are some whose opinion is valuable who think that it is preliminary to a general offensive on the part of the Allies. These authorities point out that the season is propitious in that for the next two months the temperature will be excellent for campaigning, that Great Britain has now a large enough army on or near the firing line, that the question of an ample supply of ammunition has been satisfactorily solved, and hence conclude that these artillery attacks are preliminary to a general advance on the part of the Allies.

The Dardanelles campaign has been extremely quiet during the week, both on land and on sea, so quiet in fact for the first time in many weeks. The British have issued no report of operations and the French have only mentioned this field of action once. The Turks have issued several bulletins but they make no mention of anything more important than routine skirmishes. There is little indication that any movements of great consequence are contemplated in the close future.

Cables during the week announced the return of the Queen Elizabeth to the main fleet north of Scotland.

The Austro-Italian campaign deserves no extended mention; the Italians appear unable as yet to free the Austrian defense lines at any point.

Except for the capture by the Germans of the bridgehead on the Elau River, south of Handevas, of Friedrichstadt, which enables them to move that city from an additional direction, there was little or no change in the positions in Courland during the week. Farther south, to the east of Keco, after considerable fighting the Germans established themselves apparently firmly on the line running south from Lisachagola to Novo Troki in the like district south-east of Vilna.

Still farther south, at the beginning of the week, the Germans captured the fortress of Grodno, which my readers will remember was on the point of falling when last week's record closed. The fortress fell first, then the town, and the assailants crossed the Niemen and continued their way to the eastward. Grodno was the last fortress of the Russian second line of defense left, and its fall put that line completely in German hands.

Still farther south the army of Prince Leopold of Bavaria advanced to the eastward in the direction of Slonim on the Bielostock-Minsk railroad, and reached and captured the railroad junction town of Walkowsk, and halfway to Slonim.

In eastern Galicia there was some really hard fighting, in which both sides gained local successes, but of which the final result was to force the Russian lines to the east bank of the Sath River. Probably within the next few days the very narrow strip of eastern Galicia which the Russians still hold will pass into the hands of the Austrians.

The Balkan situation is still a muddle which the past week has not tended to make any clearer; on the contrary the position has, if possible, become more involved and intricate than heretofore.

A picturesque as well as rather startling incident has recently been reported, namely the departure of the entire British fleet from its North Sea base on an errand which was not disclosed to the public. Reports from alleged eyewitnesses describe the spectacle as thrilling in the extreme; over two dreadnoughts, some of which have taken a notable part in the war, and a squadron convoyed by destroyers paid silently out to sea. The mystery of this movement added greatly to the fascination the spectacle cast over the spectators.

Self-Confidence

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

SOFT gray mist that spoke gently of the coming night swept out over New York Harbor and wrapped its folds about our feet. The crowded decks took on an air of mystery as the twilight made faces of forms vague and indistinct. Deck chairs and polished railings and windows reflected the pearl and faint rose that tinted the western sky. Far, far off a bell-buoy tinkled shrilly; farther off a light made a glowing spot of yellow against the horizon line. Other lights would soon begin to twinkle along the shore.

At the stillness at my side the Interesting Man spoke suddenly. He had a way of taking one's mind by surprise, as it were; a way of speaking of those subjects that are farthest from your brain, and speaking about it so that you become fascinated.

"It's a person's own fault if folks don't appreciate him," said the Interesting Man.

The bell-buoy tinkled again and I tore my gaze away from the misty beauty of the harbor. "What?" I questioned a bit stupidly; "what were you saying?"

"I was saying," repeated the Interesting Man, "that it's a person's own fault if he isn't appreciated. It is, you know."

The boat cut sharply through the water and left behind it a white trail of foam like fine lace on the hem of a petticoat. "Just how do you figure that out?" I asked.

"Figure it out from experience," the Interesting Man told me. "I've seen so many people spoil perfectly good chances in business, and offers of positions, and even impressions socially, because they lacked self-confidence. I've talked to men, myself, and when I've asked them if they could do something, instead of saying 'Yes, I can,' or 'I'll try my best,' I've heard them say time after time, 'I'm afraid not,' or 'Perhaps I can.' And when I hear a man say that, I hesitate to employ him."

"But isn't that modesty?" I questioned.

The Interesting Man snorted, almost. "Modesty nothing! What has modesty got to do with your business ability, or, for that matter, your any kind of ability?" he asked me. "What counts is your salesmanship in selling your own talents or business knowledge. When you go into a store, you wouldn't buy dishes from a clerk who told you that the floors painted on them would wash off the first time they were cleaned; you wouldn't consider them for a moment if you thought that the handles on the cups would come off when you lifted them. You'd buy dishes from a clerk who said 'I know they're good dishes. I've had no complaints about them, and I've sold a great many sets! You won't find better dishes in the city!' When you follow the same line of reasoning, you can see why I would be inclined to employ a man who, when I asked him if he could do something, would say 'Yes, I can,' no matter what it was; no matter how hard it was."

But, I objected, and my mind was very far away from the twinkling lights that dotted the shore, "mightn't that consider the head of conceit?"

The Interesting Man brushed back a lock of hair that has the habit of falling over his forehead. "Not at all," he told me emphatically. "That's self-confidence. Conceit is altogether different. For instance," his eyes narrowed and he looked out over the mysteriously dark water, "suppose you wrote a poem or a story that you thought was good, that you liked better than anything you had ever written. Suppose you wanted to sell his story to a large magazine, and one afternoon you went to call on the editor with your manuscript in your hand."

"Suppose (this is all just supposing) the editor was a very busy man. Suppose he looked at you shyly and said, 'Well, before I bother to read this I want to know what you think of it.' Would you say 'It's no very good,' or 'My work can't be compared with some people's,' or 'I realize that it is weak in spots, but you may like it,' or would you say 'It's the best thing I've done, and I think it would specially suit your magazine!' Which would be the best salesmanship?"

I laughed. "I'm afraid," I told him, "that if I were the editor, I'd hardly bother with the story that the author didn't think worth while. And yet it wouldn't be easy to say—that last."

The Interesting Man turned sharply in my direction. I could feel his questioning look, a look that seemed to penetrate the deepening shadows.

"Why wouldn't it be easy?" he wanted to know. "Wouldn't it be the truth? Would you be offering it for sale if you thought it wasn't good? Isn't it easy to tell the truth?"

I flushed guiltily for no reason at all. "Yes, I suppose you're right," I murmured.

The Interesting Man warmed to his subject. His voice grew more confidential.

"Well," he told me, "a person's line of business—be it selling pencils, or selling advertising, or only selling ability to run errands—is just as much his business as your business is writing and, incidentally, selling your writings. If he is efficient he should not hesitate to tell his prospective employer that he is. Because no man on the outlook for talent in any line is likely to think that a man can do good work if he doesn't think so himself."

Inquiringly I gazed at the Interesting Man, and as I looked I thought of the many times that I had blushed and stammered "I don't know—" in answer to the question, "Can you do it?" Quite suddenly I spoke.

"Are you that way yourself?" I asked him. "Do you ever say that you can't do anything? Do you ever say that you aren't sure?"

The Interesting Man laughed wholeheartedly.

"Did you think," he chuckled, "that I was just talking for fun? Do you think that I just philosophize to hear my own voice? Of course, I'm that way myself. Do I ever say that I can't do something, you ask me? Of course, I never say it—I don't even think it. Why, if the job of President of the United States were open tomorrow, and they asked me to fill it, I wouldn't hesitate."

I jumped—almost—at the amazing confidence of the man. And yet I saw that it was confidence of the right kind.

"You—you don't think that you could fill it?" I gasped, "you don't think that, if necessary, you could be President tomorrow, do you?"

"I certainly do," answered the man, "for the job of being President isn't so different from other jobs—except that it's bigger. I look at it this way:

"No matter how well any one fills a position, some folks are always dissatisfied. It's human nature—more or less. So I'd have that thought to fall back on if people said mean things to me. And, if I got into any grave tangles, I'd realize that there is always some one who is willing to help."

THE Interesting Man stopped talking just as suddenly as he had started. The lights of New York were infinitely nearer now, the shadows crowding close up to the shore were infinitely blacker, far more mysterious. The bell-buoy was out of hearing, but I knew that somewhere in the distance among the dashing waves and the lacy whiteness of the foam it was still ringing out a clear warning note. The pearl and rose color had faded from the sky.

"It's a nice night, isn't it?" said the Interesting Man.

"How is it you sought me outside?" asked Jesus of his earthly parents. "Did you not know that I must be in my Father's house?" So people today are seeking Christ outside and are not finding him, because he is in his Father's house, the church today, and is quickest found there.

THE VICTORIOUS LIFE

By CHARLES GALLAUDET TRUMBULL

THE nine days' conference was over. The afternoon before, one of the ministers present met another member of the conference and they talked together about the victorious life. "Yes," he said, "I am trusting Christ, but I haven't got all that So and So have," mentioning two leaders of the conference.

"You can have all that they have," said the other, "and you can have it all right now. I believe that the Lord wants you too this afternoon. Let's go to my room and talk it over."

They did so. The minister frankly confessed that while he had had great blessings since he first heard the message of the victorious life, he did not have all that he wanted. He had not yet been able to keep on trusting the Lord all the time in just the right way to have the fulness in victory and power that some day he did hope to attain to. He said, also, that he lacked the joy that others had whom he knew.

When his friend reminded him that Christ's grace was sufficient for him, and that all he needed to do was to recognize that, he said that he had done that before, but he was not able to keep on appropriating Christ as continuously as he wanted to.

His friend reminded him that it was not his appropriating of Christ, after all, that was the great thing in the victorious life; but it was what Christ was doing for him. Then the light came; and the two men got on their knees and thanked their Lord that he was doing in that minister's life, and doing miraculously, all that was necessary that moment for the fulness of his victory and power and joy and all else that was needed. And the minister went out "possessing his possessions" in the Lord as he had not been able to do before.

A YOUNG missionary who had been out in the field for six years and who, now back in this country, was attending the conference, prayed very humbly one day, in public, that the Lord would show him and others whatever there was in the truth of this victorious life that they did not yet understand. Later he talked the matter over in a heart-to-heart way with one of the leaders. The truth in its simplicity was clearly stated, but somehow the missionary could not get what he wanted. Then the two men prayed, and asked their Lord to work the miracle of enabling his servant to see that Christ's grace was sufficient for him in the way in which he longed to find it so. This missionary had been troubled over the question whether, when he got back to his mission field and amid the surroundings that pulled down on one, he could there be kept in miracle victory. But at the closing testimony meeting of the conference he told the others that in a miraculous way the Lord had enabled him to realize that he was his Saviour for that very moment, and that he was able to keep him that way right through life. He had entered into a new realization of Christ, not merely as a Saviour for the next world, but as a full and sufficient Saviour for this world also.

Another missionary sought out one of the speakers and said frankly that she wanted to know more about this simple truth of the victorious life, for she did not understand what it was. He told her; but she was not satisfied. He asked her whether she had honest doubts as to whether the Bible really taught the truth of victory over sin in this life, and she answered frankly that she had; she was not clear in her own mind as to the Bible teaching.

"Then," said he, "I would prayerfully study God's Word on that very subject and ask him to show you all that he would show you as to this." She said that she would.

"But right now, before we separate," said her friend, "I want you to do this: just tell the Lord quietly in a word of prayer that you now accept from him by faith all that he has for you as to this matter of the victorious life, but in a sealed package, as it were, because you do not understand it; and that you will trust him to make known to you what are the contents of this package in his own time and in his own way."

"I will do that," she said, and in a few words of trustful prayer she took from the Lord that sealed package by faith.

The next morning the two met again. Her face was radiant. "It's all right," she said. Her Lord had made known to her the contents of that wonderful package sooner, perhaps, than she had had any reason to expect. Now she was praising him for the new victory in peace and joy that she had found in it—no, in him.

The Conference Verse, which faced the eager delegates at the general meetings, was: "That I May Know Him." (Phil. 3:10).

The Post-Conference Verse, over which many hearts rejoiced, was: "I Know Him. . . . He is Able." (II Tim. 1:12).

ON the first Sabbath of the conference there had been a meeting for "seekers"—those who were hungry to have some need met in their life. At the close of this little gathering the one who was leading it said, "Let us all join together in this prayer: 'I know that Jesus is meeting all my needs now, because his grace is sufficient for me.'" The prayer was repeated by many of them.

But one young man who was there could not say that prayer from his heart. He went back to his room. He dropped on his knees, and he said over the words of the prayer. Then he said them again. And again, and again, and again. Later he told a friend that it was the hardest fight he had ever had in his life to pray that simple prayer in belief, and mean it to the limit. But as he desperately and earnestly fought this fight of faith, he finally saw that it was really true: the Lord Jesus was equal to meeting all his needs, and was doing that very thing that very minute. Yes, praise God, his grace is sufficient for us. And that young fellow went through the remaining days of the conference with radiant victory in his life and on his face and in his words to others.

A young woman who had graduated from one of our best known girls' colleges, who later had studied the Bible in a seminary noted for its destructive criticism and unbelief, and who was living in the society life of one of our larger Eastern cities, said to a conference leader toward the close of the week, "What are you going to do when you don't believe all the Bible?"

"Do you believe in God?" he asked. "I am not entirely sure," she said. "Do you believe in Christ?" he asked. "I don't know," she said.

"If I were you I would read through the Gospel of John, praying before you do so and as you do so, somewhat like this: 'God, if there is a God, show me all that you want me to know from my study of this book.'" She said that she had already studied that Gospel, but on questioning her he found that she had studied it only at that seminary of unbelief, and she herself recognized that the study he was suggesting might be quite different.

BEFORE the conference closed that girl had given her name as a student volunteer for the foreign mission field, and in a prayer circle was praying earnestly to her newly found Christ for a girl friend who had not yet surrendered her life and taken him in his fulness.

The purchasing agent of one of the best known corporations in the United States, who three or four years ago was led out through James H. McConkey's marvelous book, "The Threefold Secret of the Holy Spirit," to surrender his life to the mastery of Jesus and take his Lord as the fulness of his life, moved among the young people and older people at this conference like an angel of light, claiming great miracles from God in the lives of those with whom he talked and praising God for his readiness to answer and his power to work.

A minister's wife in conversation with one of the leaders said that if what he was then saying to her about the victorious life was the truth, she had never lived the victorious life. He had told her very simply that she could trust her Lord to do it all; and it was this "letting Christ do it all" at which she stumbled.

"Have you ever floated on the water?" he asked.

"I've tried to," she said. "That's why you didn't," he answered; and she saw the point.

The next day in one of the meetings he told on the platform about this conversation; and her husband, a minister who for several years had held off from this blessing in his own life, saw the truth and entered into victory. It was only later on that this minister learned that the conversation which God used to lead him out had been a conversation with his own wife. Can any one estimate the unmeasured way in which the Lord can use that husband and wife now in fulness of power and blessing to others?

No one who was present can ever forget the testimony or "Say So" meeting of the closing Sunday afternoon. Eighty or more persons, young and old, boys, ministers, laymen, missionaries, told of their newly found Lord and what he was meaning to them now. It must have been like a gathering of Christians in Jerusalem soon after Pentecost.

This particular conference is only one of a number that were held in different parts of this country during the summer, in which God is revealing his Son to Christians—often mature Christians as well as to those just commencing their Christian life—in a new and victorious way. I have had the privilege of attending five of such conferences during the past summer where God has been praised that he is spreading the message of the victorious life among the people in our land. It is the message for which the great Keswick Convention in England has stood and has been blessed of God to thousands throughout the world during the last forty years.

What is the "Victorious Life" as it is set forth in these conferences? It is a life that meets two simple conditions.

The first of these is unconditional surrender to the mastery of the Lord Jesus Christ. If we would enter into a life of utterly new victory over the power of sin, the first step is to tell our Lord Jesus, if we have never done so before, that we now place ourselves unreservedly in his hands in order that his whole will may hereafter decide everything in our life. Surrender is not promising never to sin again; no one would have any right to make such a promise. But surrender is placing ourselves in Christ's hands to let him take the supreme control, the dictatorship of our lives at every point. We give ourselves to him, body, mind, and spirit; and we give him also, all that we have, our possessions, our loved ones, our life plans, our ambitions and hopes: everything.

That is surrender. That is the first step in the victorious life.

And after we have done that, we can do nothing more; then it is wholly our Lord's responsibility to live the miracle of victory in us. Is he true to this responsibility? Praise God, he is. And so, after we have surrendered, all we need to do is to recognize that now we must and will do it all; yea, that this is this very moment doing it all. He is saying to us, "Sin shall not have dominion over you, for ye are under grace" (Rom. 6:14). You are not under law, where you have to do it by your own efforts, your own weakness; you are under grace, and that means that he is doing it all for you. As he adds, "My grace is sufficient for thee" (II Cor. 12:9).

THOSE who enter into the victorious life, who claim from Christ not victories, but Victory, realize that salvation from the power of their sin can be had only on the same terms—salvation from the penalty of their sin. It is exclusively Christ's work to save us from the penalty of our sins. It is exclusively Christ's work to save us from the power of our sins. And when we stop trying to help him in this work, which is his alone, he does his work gloriously and miraculously and continuously. He makes us more than conquerors. He leads us always in triumph.

It is not "sinless perfection" that is meant by this victorious life. It is not that sin is eradicated from us; for if we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. (I John 1:8). But it is recognizing that Christ offers us his Gospel, his Good News, "that ye may not sin." (I John 2:1). We are not made sinless; but we are kept from conscious sinning.

Hearts are hungry for a victory that they have never yet known. Christians who have surrendered their lives unconditionally to the mastery of their Saviour are still unsatisfied and defeated, not because they have not surrendered, but because they have not, after surrender, that it is wholly their Lord's responsibility to meet all their needs; and that he is true to his responsibility. Surrender and faith; those are the two simple conditions of victory. "Letting go, and letting God." By surrender we let go. By faith we let God. Faith is remembering God's faithfulness.

May we so trust our Lord, now for this unspeakable blessing, that he can use us to give himself as a new Christ and Lord and Life to hungry Christians all about us.

What is in the heart will surely come out of the mouth—and at the same time remain in the heart.

A man should be able to say that he has fought a good fight even though he did not win a great victory. It is better to have lost after making a good fight than to have won without any effort—but such a thing is not possible.

Young man, read poetry, for it tells you what men have dreamed; read philosophy, for it tells you what men have thought and taught; read romance, for it tells you what men have loved and imagined; read history, for it tells you what men have wrought and fought and suffered. You should know what the men of the past have dreamed and said and done.

Questions and Answers

W. W. Watertown, Conn. I read The Christian Herald with much interest, and our answer to the question, "What became of the sacred Ark of the Jews when the temple was destroyed by the Babylonians?" called to mind what I had a few days before read in "The Apocrypha" (II Maccabees, 2: 4-7), namely: "It was also contained in the same writing that the prophet (Jeremiah) being warned of God, commanded the tabernacle and the ark to go with him; and he went forth into the mountain where Moses climbed up, and saw the heritage of God. And when Jeremey came thither, he found a hollow cave wherein he laid the tabernacle, and the ark, and the altar of incense, and so stopped the door. And some of them that followed him came to mark the way, but they could not find it. Which, when Jeremey perceived, he blamed them, saying: 'As for that place, it shall be unknown until the time that God gather his people together again and receive them unto mercy.'"

The passage in II Maccabees is well known to Bible students, but it is far from solving the mystery. There have been various legends preserved concerning the hiding-place of the Ark—unless, as some conjecture, it was taken away or destroyed by Eubuchadnezzar.

C. M., South Boston, Va. 1. We avoid questions that are purely controversial. In the cases mentioned, no definite claim can be made either way and therefore discussion would be unprofitable. 2. The passage in I John 3: 9 is held to mean that in the regenerate, the higher nature, as gotten of God, does not commit sin. The principle within such a one makes him hate sin and resist it. Luther expressed this condition when he wrote: "The child of God receives words daily and never throws away his arms or his peace with his deadly foe." Paul, when he spoke of the law of his members warring against the law of his spirit, illustrated the same idea. R. 7:21 25.

H., Pattonsburg, Mo. The general principle of Sabbath observance, as frequently explained in The Mail-Bag, is to avoid all unnecessary labor on the day; to abstain from regular vocation ourselves and endeavor to so arrange matters that others can enjoy the same privilege; to confine our energies to works of necessity and mercy and to make the day one of rest, worship and recuperation. Thus one who so conducted his business during the week that others would unavoidably be kept busy on Sunday, is acting in violation of the spirit of Sabbath observance.

J. H., Mount Morris, Ill. 1. What language is regarded as the oldest? 2. Were the Sumerian, Babylonian, Assyrian, Chaldean and Accadian languages all written in the cuneiform character? 3. What do the world's best scholars say about the Biblical account of the 'confusion of Languages'? 4. Did Abraham bring the Hebrew with him to Canaan, or was it a language he learned in Canaan as immigrants to the United States learn English? 5. Is it certain that the Israelites brought the same language out of Egypt that they took into it? 6. Have the sites of any cities been discovered known to be antediluvian? If so, did they differ any from those known to be post-diluvian? And were any decipherable inscriptions found in them?

The foregoing letter has been submitted by the Christian Herald to Professor Clay of the Babylonian Department of Yale University, an acknowledged authority on such subjects. He has replied as follows:

The oldest languages known at the present time are the Sumerian, Babylonian (or Accadian) and the Egyptian. The earliest known inscriptions belong to about the fifth millennium B. C. but it is reasonable to assume that these were preceded by many different languages which had a great antiquity. 2. The script of the Sumerian, Babylonian or Accadian and Assyrian, was the cuneiform. Chaldean, the language used generally as the diplomatic language about the time of the Babylonian captivity, was the Aramaic language, which is what we now know as the Aramaic language. 3. Archeology has thrown no light upon the subject of the confusion of tongues. 4. Adam very probably spoke the Aramaic, the language of Aram. In Canaan his descendants apparently used the language of the land, which was that of the Amorites. This is what we now know as Hebrew. 5. It would seem that the Israelites retained while in Egypt the language familiar to them, but archeology has thrown no light upon the subject. 6. Nothing has been discovered which can be determined as antediluvian. Babylonian legends mention several cities as existing before the flood, and Arabic tradition says Haran was the first city that was rebuilt after the deluge, but archeology has offered no certain data as yet on the subject.

R., Witt, Ill. 1. Thanks for the poem. We have received copies from others also. 2.

Those who risk their lives in speed trials are properly regarded as criminally reckless. 3. Our Children's Home at Mont-Lawn planned to give an outing to nearly 3,000 little tenement boys and girls this summer, and the total will not fall far short of that figure. Contributions sent now will still be available for this season's work. 4. See later for answer to your last question.

A half dozen readers send sad and anxious letters telling of various kinds of spiritual trouble and perplexity. One writes of frequently yielding to sin. Another is worried because she does not feel sufficiently sorry for sin, is not always willing to do God's will. Another is troubled by jealousy and by sinful thoughts which grieve her deeply. Another is ill and nervous, very unhappy and has not the assurance that she is saved. Another has fallen into doubt, has lost her experience and has not been able to get back to God. Another no longer finds comfort in prayer, wonders why prayers are not answered, and complains: "Why can't I get the peace I formerly had?"

Now we are sure there is help for these distressed souls and really wish that we might help them, but it seems hardly out of place to say that such testimonies as these are not calculated to win unbelievers to become Christians. They seem strangely out of keeping with the triumphant and jubilant note of the New Testament. What must outsiders think upon reading or hearing such gloomy words from those who profess the name of the radiant Christ? But this answer should not be full of condemnation, but of encouragement. Probably in more than the two cases in which sickness is mentioned that is the real cause of the spiritual difficulty. Many are so overburdened with work and care, and find it so nearly impossible to get sufficient rest and sleep and recreation that the mind is practically never in a thoroughly normal condition. For such the first necessity is rest, and in many cases special medical treatment which will put the body and, as a consequence, the mind in a condition to receive and recognize spiritual truth. As to the sins, some consciences are so sensitive or misguided that innocent acts are made to appear sinful. Satan tempts us and tries to bring us into bondage, whereas when Christ talks to us he tells us firmly but kindly what is wrong and then shows us the way out. We can only repeat the old, old story which will be found true for everyone who really rests his life upon it. Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, and the blood of Jesus Christ, God's Son, cleanseth us from all sin. We must forsake sin; we must confess our sin, both to God and to those whom we have wronged. We must so far as possible make restitution for past wrong. We must trust literally and personally, and definitely and completely believe that God does, through Christ, forgive our sins; we must trust him also to cleanse our hearts from sin by the power of the Holy Spirit and by the resistless energy of the great fact of the death of Christ. We must trust him, moment by moment, to keep us from sin, to guide and empower us in our work for others, to answer our prayers when he sees that to answer them our way would increase our efficiency and to deny us when, as in the case of Paul, he sees that his way is better than ours. Above all and through all we must know that the deepest and most enduring fact in the world is the fact that God loves us. Approach him always as a friend, not as a tyrant. And remember that he is just as much grieved when we distrust and fear him as we should be if our most dearly loved ones were afraid of us and doubted our love. Will not all these friends stop doubting God and begin to trust him, thereby exchanging misery and failure for victory and gladness? Remember that without faith it is impossible to please him. This is the victory that overcometh the world—your faith. Then put your faith to work. Get busy in saving and helping and cheering others. Forget yourself in helping others. And your lives will show the glorious fruits of the faith that worketh by love.

Hartford Check was good as gold through Stormy Days of Civil War

The last mail from the North in 1861, brought to James L. Byington of Albany, Ga., a check of the Hartford Fire Insurance Company for $800 in payment of a loss. Received too late to be sent North for collection this check was universally accepted as legal tender and during the Civil War traveled throughout the Southern States, changing hands many times as readily as gold coin, increasing in value as Confederate money depreciated. When it finally reached its home bank in Hartford in 1864 it was literally covered with endorsements. For over a century, through war, panic and conflagration, the "Hartford's" name on a promise to pay has everywhere been as "good as gold."

By REV. F. B. MEYER, D.D.

"Be sure your sin will find you out."—Rom. 32, 28.

Sin is like the boomerang of the savage, which, when thrown at a passing object, returns to the feet of the thrower; or it may be compared to a bloodhound, which, sooner or later, will track you to your hiding place, followed by the officers of justice. After Israel's defeat at Ai, Joshua and Phineas stood up to discover the transgressor with the aid of the Urim and Thummin, i.e., the diamond stone of judgment, which shone with God's Yes and dimmed with his No. The princes of Israel passed before them first, then the clans, then the families; and Achan must have known in his heart of hearts that the inevitable Nemesis of his sin would find him out. He watched the closing in of destiny, the gradual tightening of the coil. If your sin is not forgiven, if it is not covered by God, if it has not been honorably confessed and put away, you may be sure that it will turn up, will track you down and take you by the throat. It will ferret out your clues and lead you to arrest. You can escape it. The universe of God is wide, from continent to continent your sin follow you. "Though they dig into hell thence shall mine hand take them; though they climb up to heaven, thence will I bring them down." There is no escape for a sinner, where he will be safe, except in the wounds of Jesus, crucified for our sins, raised for our justification.

Trouble with a Garden

By Arthur H. Howland

A BEAUTIFUL garden! Trees, fruit, flowers, birds—all the makings of gladness.

Nature goes right on being beautiful no matter what men and women do. Grapes gleamed, flowers bloomed, grasses waved, birds sang in Naboth's vineyard, unaware of the drama of souls that was taking place. Perhaps all the time that Naboth and Ahab and Jezebel and the wicked witnesses and judges were playing their tragedy, a little child flitted into the garden day by day. He was not conscious of any change in the garden, except the changes of the ripening season. To him it was a happy place every day. But to Ahab that garden became a ghastly thing. The fragrance of its fruits and flowers turned to reeking odors; its sunlight became black darkness; its bird-song the knell of death.

"Has thou found me, O mine enemy?" The gaunt figure of the prophet had confronted him; the voice of God had found his soul; his sin had found him out; he and his were doomed.

Yes, the garden was a pretty spot. It adjoined Ahab's palace at Samaria. The gorgeous palace, so gorgeous that the very building was described as inlaid with ivory, whereas even Solomon had had only an ivory throne, required fitting gardens. In Europe and the East gardens are thought much more of than here—the garden is almost as important as the mansion or the palace, often far more elaborate. So Ahab wanted Naboth's gardens.

Ahab was an old-fashioned king, so he supposed Naboth would yield to his wishes as a matter of course. But Naboth was something of a democrat. It was his garden. Not even the king could make him sell it. He liked it; he loved it, for many memories lingered within it. It was the old home garden, his and his father's, and his father's father's—for generations. As a matter of fact, the religious laws of Israel forbade his selling it permanently out of the family. See Lev. 25:23-28; Num. 36:7.

So Naboth was in a hard place. He loved the garden; he wished to keep it; the law commanded him to keep it; the king demanded that he sell or trade it. Naboth refused, and Ahab sulked.

The garden atmosphere had suddenly become heavy for Ahab, and he went home, petulant and sulking and grieved; lay down, turned his face to the wall, and refused to eat.

Then Jezebel taunted him. Was he that kind of a king? Leave the matter to her.

This was where Ahab sinned. He should not have left it to her. He knew what she had threatened to do to Elijah; he knew what she would plan to do to Naboth. He could never say he was not to blame for what she did. He was to blame. He could have stopped her, and he did not. So what followed was not her doing but his.

Naboth is accused. False witnesses testify to absurd charges—the charge of blasphemy, of which he certainly was not guilty in trying to hold his vineyard; the charge of treason, based on his refusal to obey the king. He is stoned. The owner of the garden is dead. Then Jezebel comes and tells Ahab that the garden is his.

He walks out to it, is looking vain at its fruits and flowers and grasses, when a shadow crosses his path. Elijah has come, the man of God.

"Hast thou found me, O mine enemy?" cried the guilty king.

The garden had gone gray again. And in that gloom and terror Elijah prophesied the dreadful end of the weak and wicked king and his demon-driven queen.

Ahab repented; repented so deeply that the Lord delayed the evil. But the penalties came at last for both queen and king.

How shall we sum up the story, in one saying; a saying better understood now perhaps than in any other age of the world's history: "It does not pay." Men are keen nowadays on what pays and what does not. Surely Ahab and Jezebel made a poor bargain when they got Naboth's vineyard. Every bargain in which the price paid is sin is a desperately poor bargain.

Greed caused it all. Ahab wanted what was not his. He loved himself more than he loved his neighbor. So the beauties of the garden were spoiled for him and for all others, and his life was wrecked.

"Be sure your sin will find you out." Live so that every time your Elijah appears you will be glad to see him, not troubled and confused. Probably every person has some friend or acquaintance that stands for conscience. You know that what he or she disapproves is wrong. You know how you hate to meet that friend after you have yielded to temptation. You make that friend your enemy. You shrink from him instead of seeking him. Chase such a friendship as that. Make a friend of your conscience so that you are not afraid.

Live so that every garden you see will be beautiful whether it is yours or not. Do not help to spoil the beauties and glories and sweetnesses of life by sin. There is enough beauty in the world to cheer the hearts of all, if only people would be good.

By Rev. Franklin E. Hoskins, D.

JEZREEL. Travelers in the Holy Land journeying northward along the beaten track from Samaria to Nazareth must cross the Plain of Jezreel, called also the Plain of Jezel, and almost invariably pass the ancient site of the city of Jezreel. A little north of the present village (Zer'in) a deep valley slopes downward to the Jordan, and through this valley runs the railroad between Haifa and Damascus. It was once proposed to cut a canal from the Mediterranean to the Jordan Valley, filling up the trough of the Dead Sea and paralleling the canal by a second route. If such a project were ever carried out the river or eastern end of the canal would be within a mile or so of Jezreel.

The same stream that would have turned Naboth's vineyard into a "garden of herbs" for Ahab's delight now wears fig orchards and forms a little oasis among the mounds of rubbish which cover the ancient site.

The elders." The old men of Jezreel knew every plot of land and its boundaries better than any surveyor or order of deeds ever knew his district.
The old custom of "bumping the boundaries" in England has many a counterpart in Bible lands, and to those elders would be referred every proposal concerning the value, the buying, the selling and the exchanging of any plot or vineyard.
Both elders and nobles had grown shamelessly corrupt or hopelessly afraid of the wicked queen, and so joined complicitly in one of the blackest crimes that ever blotted the pages of history.
Men of Belial" witnessed against him. From that day to the present he has the charge of blasphemy against God and the king is a favorite one ever employed by false witnesses, and sad to say the charge is not at all an infrequent one. The present martial courts sitting in time of war have no more difficult and distressing task to perform than sifting out the many iniquitous charges of this kind.

Death by stoning has long been abolished by the laws of all lands, and is unheard of in modern history.
"Sold thyself." This verse was often cited in connection with the curious superstition so long current in the Middle Ages according to which a man literally "sold himself" to the devil for a certain number of years of pleasure, wealth or occult knowledge. The words in the mouth of Elijah were simple Oriental hyperbole, and it remained for the nations of the West, more than a thousand years later, to develop this expression, with many similar ones, into the Faust legend. There is not a trace of any such conception or possibility in any customs of Bible lands that I have ever heard of after thirty-three years in Syria.

After Fifty Years

FIFTY years ago last May 200,000 men in blue, led by General George Gordon Meade, marched up Pennsylvania Avenue in Washington in grand review. Their work was done.
Victors, but not exultant in victory, they left behind them the fields of conflict and returned to farm and shop and store and school. Through all the daylight hours of two memorable days, the firm tramp thrilled the capital and echoed in paeans of thankfulness throughout the nation. The war was over.
With more than 2,000,000 of their comrades these soldiers passed out of the army into civil life, to serve their country no less faithfully as citizens. In the great Southland many thousands more were returned to ways of peace. There was no grand review; they returned disappointed, beaten, but not defeated, to wasted plantations and to ruined homes. There they, too, took up, the burden of citizens; and through the age of reconstruction and the rebuilding of a civil life upon new foundations, they wrought well, how well the great commonwealths of the New South now testify. Two years ago the last smoldering embers of the enmities of the sixties were quenched in the great reunion of Blue and Gray on the field of Gettysburg. This year the Grand Army of the Republic will hold its Fifty-ninth Annual Encampment in Washington, beginning Monday, September 27, and continuing to Saturday, October 2. On Wednesday, the 29th, the veterans, a remnant only of the army of '65, will again pass in review on Pennsylvania Avenue. Lieutenant-General Nelson A. Miles, U. S. A., retired, who participated in the review of fifty years ago, will be the grand marshal of the parade. In place of the Tennessee tailor of '65 the marchers will see the Jersey schoolteacher of 1915, but no silent soldier Grant will watch the review, unless his spirit of dogged determination to serve the right to ultimate victory may be said to rest up this same schoolmaster. Accrued in '65 by a war-weary North, the marchers of 1915 will be honored by nation, one and inseparable; and in a line will march both Blue and Gray, the Gray as guests of the Blue.
(The more than two and a half million men who made up the grand army disbanded in '65, scarcely a quarter of a million remain to-day, and the final "taps" is sounding for many thousands of them every year. The membership of the G. A. R. is now about 194,000, about the same total report for several years. Probably eighty per cent. of the living veterans are members of the G. A. R.; not all of the way on the pension rolls, and there is a way of arriving at the exact number of survivors of the armies of the North. Before many years the "review" will sound up yonder for the last soldier of '65; but their work will remain.

As a part of the exercises of the coming encampment, the G. A. R. will lay the cornerstone of the new Memorial Amphitheater in Arlington National Cemetery, on Friday, October 1. On Monday, September 27, more than 25,000 "boys in blue" will arrive in Washington for the encampment; on Tuesday a camp-fire will be held at Fort Stevens, where President Lincoln watched the battle which might have ended in the Confederate capture of Washington. Wednesday will be the day of the great review; Thursday and Friday will be devoted to business sessions, and Saturday will see the saying of goodbyes. The Woman's Relief Corps and the National Association of Patriotic Instructors will also hold their annual meetings in Washington during the time of the encampment. One thousand boy scouts and high school cadets will act as official guides to the visitors.

Besides the Memorial Amphitheater at Arlington, the veterans will see in process three other memorials: a great bronze equestrian statue of General Grant near the Botanic Garden, at the east end of the Mall; the $2,000,000
National Memorial to President Lincoln, on the bank of the Potomac, at the western end of the Mall; and the permanent headquarters of the American Red Cross, adjoining the Corcoran Art Gallery, which will carry the inscription: "In Memory of the Heroic Women of the Civil War."

The Little Boy I Love

IN TRUTH'S white scales we should always weigh Both folks and facts impartially;
But here I have firmly fixed my mind
That another child you will never find
Like the little boy I love.

What tales you read in his sea-blue eyes
Of the unknown past, of mysteries,
Sorrowful thought and laughing mirth!
Never were there such eyes on earth,
As those of the boy I love.

And I think that Solomon himself
Would spare the rod if the roguish elf
Looked mischief out of such wonderful eyes Effective appeal for pardon lies
In the gaze of the boy I love.

We shall lose the little boy some day;
He will wander out, he will wander away;
We shall miss the curls of his sunny hair,
And the baby smile in his eyes, but where Will he be, the boy I love?

Pray heaven that not from life's dizzy verge
Will the baby slip to the rushing surge
That rises to sweep dear ones from us
We must lose the child, but oh, not thus—
Not thus, dear heart of love.

He must go; the lad who will take his place
Will have submerged all the pretty baby grace
Into boasts, and language quite high-flown;
But where will the little lad have gone—
The little boy I love?

To what mystic land, the land of dreams,
And vanished glories, and smiles, and gleams;
Oh, there where the softest sunlight falls,
In the sunniest nook in memory's halls,
Will he dwell, the boy I love.

Who calls it unreal, this home of the heart,
Where we enter and dwell from the world apart?
No alien soul can invade its rest,
No power can tear from my faithful breast
The little boy I love.

THE DINING ROOM

WHEN it came to finishing the

LUXEBERRY WHITE ENAMEL

Whitest White Stays White

This gives a rich snow white finish in either dull or gloss effects. It appeals to people who want something better than the ordinary white interior at no higher cost. Sanitary, washable and will not crack combination is a perfect color harmony and imparts an air of rich, quiet elegance to the room.

Hardware and Brains

By JOHN A. DICKSON

CARPET tacks and cook stoves, and every article of hardware within and outside this range, made George Hammer's fortune or rather, this hardware stock was the instrument with which he made a fortune for himself out of brains. The brains were his own.

I should like to remark right here that the same sort of brain power would make a fortune in any line.

I met him on a de luxe train bound for the San Francisco Exposition, with his wife and family. His motor car was en route by freight for the same destination, and since hardware furnished the funds with which to pay for all this comfort and enjoyment, he was very enthusiastic about hardware.

We scraped an acquaintance in the Club Car, and I discovered his hobby in a very few minutes. When I told him I aspired to be a sort of business historian, he gave me the story of his business. This is it in condensed form.

The first unique feature of his career was that he deliberately decided on the hardware business after an intelligent survey and analysis of its possibilities. I say it was unique, because it always seems to me that a good many hardware dealers have had their businesses "wished" onto them—or have been "wished" onto the business. They seem to be so accidental. I guess most men in all businesses are like that. That's why there are so many failures, probably.

I asked Hammer how he happened to go in for hardware.

"WELL," he said, "contrary to the assertions of numerous alleged humorists—traveling salesmen—it wasn't because my name is Hammer. When I was at school I read or heard somebody say that success was not so easily achieved by doing something that nobody else had ever done, as by doing better than anybody else what many others were doing—and that idea stuck. Then I came to the conclusion that the margin between success and failure was not great. One doesn't have to be a prodigy. To be just a little better than the average is enough—and the average is not very hard to surpass. And that thought became a working conviction. Another was, that generally the greatest possibilities lie where there is the greatest chance for improvement—in other words, where the average is lowest.

"This last point is what first set me to thinking about hardware. The retail hardware business certainly could stand improvement. I believed it wouldn't take much effort to be a little better than the average in this line. I don't mean in the quality of the goods sold, but in the quality of the service. And that is what I intended to sell, whatever business I went into. In our town we always had to coax the clerks in the hardware stores to wait upon us—and if our furnace or stove needed repairing, we always felt that we had been unusually favored if the dealer condescended to do our work within a couple of weeks. In fact, our dealer's usual answer to a request for service of any kind was 'I'll see if I can help you out.'

"Wouldn't such conditions make the hardware business look like a cinch? It looked that way to me. There were any number of other reasons that helped along my decision, but these are fair samples.

"I was conservative even in those days about making a start. I wanted to be sure beforehand that I could finish. So I got a job in a local store for six months. I hadn't been on the job half that time when I felt sure my theories were all straight, and could be made facts. Then I was so impatient to get started that I could hardly force myself to stay out the half year, but I spent the time profitably in finding fault with things as they were. For instance, I gave less thought to the lines we carried than to those we didn't have, but could have sold profitably. We were not serving our trade as well as we could have served it, and we were losing money by not doing it.

"My boss thought that a hardware stock in 1900 should be just what it was in 1870, whereas one of my big ideas about a hardware stock was, is, that it can be made more inclusive than almost any other retail stock, because it serves the family in so many of its needs and activities. For example, a hardware stock must furnish the utensils for the care and preparation of food, from refrigerators to frying-pans for the making and care of clothing—needles, scissors, irons, etc.; for comfort and convenience in the home—heating plants, electrical supplies, wear strips; for pleasure—guns, fishing-tackle, bicycles, automobile supplies; and so on. Can you beat that as a foundation for a business?

"When my time as clerk expired I consummated a deal for a hardware store in Linden, Ohio, a town of 10,000, not far from our town. The owner was going west for his health and I bought it for its invoice price; that is, I gave the owner all the money I had, and my note for the balance.

"I'll never forget the thrill of that first morning when I walked into my own store. I considered it minor although I owed for four-fifths of it.

"I didn't need to spend much time in formulating a policy. I had been thinking that for eighteen months, and had my store policy all worked out and ready to work at.

"AS I said before, the foundation for a retail business must be Service; and the superstructure must be Selection and the roof must be Service. As a rule, my goods could not be much better, if any, than my competitors. So I had to depend on better service to make my store better than any other. Service—and by that I mean the treatment given the customer and his needs, both before and after the sale—is remembered long after the goods are forgotten. So my policy was to sell service along with the goods. I determined to make every customer like my store, and want to succeed, and help it to succeed because I believed I could make my customers understand that my store added much to the comfort and happiness of their daily lives."

"That sounds rather sentimental," I interjected.

"You bet it does," said Hammer; "and I'd like to write a book about the sentimental element in business. That is what is lacking in most business men. They would be more successful if they had more of it—if they better knew its value in business. Do you realize that the average man and woman must give quite a little thought and time every day to the business of buying? Perhaps the purchase is only a newspaper or a lunch, or a piano or a house. Some of our needs must be supplied every day, and most of us must buy the things we need or want. And our buying is directed by our emotions just as truly as all of our acts are directed. I believe the paper that expresses my political opinions, although another may be a better newspaper. I buy my lunch where I can get a table with a view from the window, or where I know the head waiter. I may buy an inferior house in a neighborhood inhabited by my friends, rather than a better house in a locality where I am not acquainted. Every human relationship has its sentimental side. My gift to a beggar is a choice of a barber, my vote for president, are all decided, more or less, by some sentimental appeal; and the relationships are close and lasting in proportion to the strength of this sentimental appeal. As I have said, our emotions rule our buying. How can I hope to control the purchases of men and women except by an appeal to their emotions?"

"Now, most people get a certain pleasure in buying what they need or want. It is one of the satisfactions they get in return for the work done to earn the money. For instance, it is a pleasant little adventure for Mrs. Brown to come down and buy a new aluminum teakettle. She enjoys looking over the

It brings warmth into your home

A Florence Oil Heater drives the chill out of your house in no time at all. It warms your living rooms in the raw days of autumn. It helps out your furnace in the bitter weeks of winter when the cold seems to edge its way in through every crack and joint. Perhaps the furnace doesn't get the dining-room warm enough for a comfortable early breakfast; perhaps a bathroom, bedroom or guest-room sometimes needs a little extra heat. The Florence Oil Heater gives you welcome warmth when you need it. It gives you real homelike comfort. It does its work quickly—and economically.

Aside from their particularly handsome and attractive appearance Florence heaters are strong and solid in construction and absolutely safe. There is nothing to get out of order; no fussy parts to lose.

But above all, the Florence is a stove type heater. In some heaters the wick turns down into the oil reservoir. This often breeds danger. In the Florence stove type heater the wick is contained in a special air-cooled tube, entirely separate from the oil chamber. This means absolute safety always. There are no perforations to clog. The draft stays perfect, without soot or odor. Cleaning is reduced to a minimum. Rewicking is simple.

You can secure the Florence in any one of three sizes, depending on what your heating needs may be. The largest of these sizes is a giant, made to heat the biggest, coldest room. There is a reliable dealer near you who has them in stock. Write for his name and for our illustrated descriptive catalog. It is free.

CALLER HIGHER

A long-time reader of this paper, Professor G. Wesley Walker of Monrovia, Md., recently passed away in his seventy-seventh year. He was a teacher of music and developed the musical talent of a very large neighborhood for two generations. Mr. Walker was an active practical Christian, a vigorous temperance advocate, and a member of the Bethesda M. E. Church. Four daughters and three sons survive him. Professor Walker's remarkable likeness to Abraham Lincoln has often been commented upon.

Christian Herald Prayer League

A BROKEN home means almost the keenest pain of all life's trials. Who can measure the joy that goes with a letter like this: "Our son was gone for over a year and we did not know where he was. I prayed for him every night that God would grant that I might hear from him soon. Last week I received a letter from him, and I believe it was in direct answer to prayer." A happy wife writes from Virginia: "I wish to thank you all for the prayers you offered for the return of my dear husband. He came home last Sunday night, and I want to thank the Prayer League for praying for his return."

Mrs. S. L. D. writes: "I asked the League for prayer for myself and I thank God and the League with all my heart for the help I received both physically and spiritually, and also for the friend for whom I asked prayer. He has been saved from the liquor habit and has been straight for almost one year." "I asked for prayers once before," writes Mrs. L. C. "for a dying daughter and she was restored to health and is still healed, both body and soul." J. R. B. writes: "I want to acknowledge answered prayer for a revival in a community near Asheville, N. C. God has been good to us." "We meet next Sunday to organize and hope soon to erect a church building."

A reader of Pittsburg, Pa., writes acknowledging "God's wonderful answer to two requests for prayer. One prayer was answered before the letter could have reached you, and I am greatly encouraged in a new venture I have taken up." A wife writes from East Liverpool, Ohio: "About one year ago I wrote asking the prayers of the League that I might be delivered from an overwhelming trouble. The prayer has been graciously answered, and I give God the praise." A League Helper writes: "I asked the League to join me in prayer for the reconciliation of two of my friends. I want to say that this has been answered." Mrs. B. F. W. writes from Glastonbury, Conn.: "I praise God for many, many answers to prayer. I am trusting him."

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have also been received from:

Mr. V. H., Pattonsburg, Mo.; S. E. B., Cottage Grove, Ore.; Mrs. J. E., Malta Bend, Mo.; Mrs. W. B., Oaktown, Ind.; M. S., Carrollton, Ga.; Mrs. A. E. P., Sanford, Fla.; Mrs. C. B., Riniya, Texas; H. C., Glen Ridge, N. J.; Mrs. A. H. E., Springfield, O.; Mrs. J. H. B., Asbury Park, N. J.; M. D., Salem, Oregon.

Reports continue to come from the Bowery Mission that the Prayer League is a great blessing to the men there. The week's petitions are presented to the men at their Brotherhood meeting Sunday evening and they are made to feel that they are in touch with the great family of God's people who have learned to take their burdens and perplexities and sorrows to the unseen Friend. The leader of the Brotherhood, Mr. Charles Balevre, recently reported that the petitions so far received and presented to the Bowery Brotherhood in the year and seven months since the Prayer League was organized, totaled 28,890. With the exception of a few score, all these requests were received at the Christian Herald office of the Prayer League, and after being duly tabulated were forwarded to the mission. In many instances, the Fulton Street Noonday Prayer Meeting has joined in this happy work of faith. Who can measure the blessings upon souls, bodies and homes for which the way has been prepared by these thousands and thousands of prayers?

AMONG THE WORKERS

THERE is an increasing demand for Christian Social Service Workers, and many young men and women are being led to volunteer. To train these young people, civic training schools have been organized in some cities, and a few religious training schools are also endeavoring to meet the need. The Chicago Training School—Lucy Rider Meyer, principal—is one of these institutions, where principles and practice combine to give excellent preparation for this special class of work. Mrs. Meyer will reply to any inquirers who may write to her at 1919 Indiana Ave., Chicago, Ill.

But the number of requests, great as they are, does not equal the number of prayers, for all these thousands of requests have been echoed in the hearts of thousands of praying and believing friends in this and other continents.

A minister who feels a call to evangelistic work asks prayer that the way may be opened for special training for this work, and that his wife, who is stricken with consumption, may be healed. A wife asks prayer that her husband may be healed of paralysis and that she may be successful in a business enterprise upon the success of which their welfare seems to depend.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at Chatham, Ont., for the work among six thousand Jews in Toronto, and that the converts may stand true; Norman, Okla.; Alcover, S. C. (that the Sunday schools of this neighborhood may be united and the sale of intoxicating liquors be abolished); in Taft, Tenn.; Big Rock and Atlanta, Mich.; Wise, Va.; Dunkerton, Ia., prayers are asked for a world-wide revival. Mrs. J. T., South Carolina, requests prayer for a revival in their church, and also that they may carry an election for state-wide prohibition to be held September 15. Mrs. W. H., Bambill, Africa, requests prayer for God's blessing upon the French Testaments and Gospels already distributed among French-speaking nations in the North Bangia Cheri Bornu District and for the few hundred more which she expects to give out in August and September. E. J. R., Sunnyside, Wash., requests prayer that an evangelist may be sent there and that a church trouble may be settled.

Mrs. M. B. P., Mrs. M. E. R., Mrs. H. H. ask prayer that their sight may be restored; Mrs. A. E. P., that a minister's sight may be restored; F. N. M., that a sister's sight may be restored; N. R. K., a friend's; S. M. K., that sight may be strengthened; Mrs. M. E. G., that her mother's sight may be strengthened; Mrs. M. E. R., her husband's; Mrs. S. K. M., her daughter's; Mrs. W. A. N., a friend's.

Mrs. B. D. asks prayer that her son's mind may be restored; a wife, her husband's; C. M., a brother's; F. W. M., a sister's; Mrs. G. H. O., a daughter-in-law's; N. R. K., a minister's. Seven other friends ask prayer for mental restoration or strengthening for themselves or other friends.

Mrs. M. A. P., Mrs. A. E. B., Mrs. A. H. O., and Mrs. G. A. O. ask prayer that sons may be saved from the liquor habit; Mrs. M. and Mrs. S., their husbands; Mrs. S., two sons; E. S., L. K., M. G., Mrs. M. A. P., their brothers; Mrs. M. E. R., two brothers and a boy; Mrs. J. G., three brothers; F. E. P., a nephew; Mrs. R. asks prayer that two brothers may be saved from the desire for drugs.

Thirty-six friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Thirteen readers ask prayer that relatives or friends may be delivered from the liquor habit; one that two brothers may give up the desire for drugs.

Sixty-three friends ask prayer for the conversion of friends or relatives.

Nine friends ask prayer for special spiritual blessing for relatives or friends.

Sixty-three readers ask prayer for the healing of friends or relatives, including one that an old lady may be cured of pain from a broken hip; another that husband may regain his power of speech; thirty friends ask prayer for the healing of themselves, including two who ask that they may gain the use of limbs and hands, and another to be cured of stammering.

Seven friends ask prayer for healing of hearing for themselves or other friends.

Twenty-nine readers ask prayer for help or guidance in financial affairs.

Forty-four friends ask prayer for the granting of varied desires and needs, including one mother that son may find steady employment and thus bring joy to two homes.

Bran

Needed Every Day

The doctors of America have brought millions to bran food. Well-advised people, at least one daily, now serve bran in some form.

The best form is a morning dainty—Pettijohn's. It is wheat flaked, with 25% bran hidden in the flakes.

The bran is unground, which makes it efficient. It is tender. In this combination it is very inviting. This is luxury made to foster bran habits, and how well it does that.

Young People's Topics for October 3

What Will Make Our Society a Great Success?

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U.
Topic. John 4:27-36 (Consecration Meeting)

ONE of the fundamental blunders of modern religious work and teaching is the failure to recognize the fact that human beings, young or old, do not naturally like God and God's ways. To plan out a religious program on the assumption that they do is to make a bee-line for failure. If it were true that people naturally loved God and his ways, Jesus would never have said: "Ye must be born again." The fundamental and primary need for all Christian work is a new heart, a heart that loves God, that loves the thought of God, that delights in the ways of God.

We are bound to fail when we undertake to do heavenly things in earthly strength.

The first need for every young people's society is that its leaders and its members have a vital Christian experience, an experience which comes from a changed heart, an experience that makes them love God and makes them delight to serve him.

There is no need to try to reach the goal of success unless we start here. Every other start is a false start, on a mistaken path.

But now with this first right step the second step, as Jesus outlined it after stating emphatically that the first step was to get love toward God into the soul, is to love other people. The reason we do not do more to help other people is simply that we do not care enough for them. Jesus said more about this matter than his simple statement that we should love others as ourselves. That was simply a repetition and summing up of the old law. But the whole message of his life was that we should love others more than we love self. The really victorious people, known and unknown, are those who have loved others so much that they have sacrificed self for their service. You get a lot of young people really caring for other people and something will happen in that society that looks very much like success.

Two other things now—things that have been written about so much and on which so much technical literature is available for young people's work that they need only be mentioned here—System, Industry. System includes organization—a place for everybody; and Industry means really working at it.

The Vindication of a Heroic Life

Epworth League Topic. Isa. 37:14-23, 33-36

BISHOP FOWLER used to begin his great lecture on Abraham Lincoln with the words: "God's heroes have the right of way."

The record of Hezekiah tells the story of a brave man, brave for God, making sacrifices and producing results for God and God's people. The clearest and best picture in the story is found in the 29th, 30th and 31st chapters of II. Chronicles, telling of the great revival which swept the kingdom under Hezekiah's leadership.

Our lesson shows a point in Hezekiah's career at which some of God's enemies tried to block his path, and records how God at this time gave him this "right of way."

Hezekiah knew what to do with a tough problem. He "spread it before the Lord."

The record states that Hezekiah's help came in a supernatural way. But prayer is answered just as really even when nothing supernatural is apparent. The most practical and ordinary form of answer is the effect of prayer upon the mind and will of the person who prays. Prayer gives us a mental calm, putting our minds at their best. We see things clearly, we weigh things accurately, we can make the wisest possible decisions and feel our wills to carry out our best judgments. But beside putting us thus at our best, prayer brings us into direct personal touch with God.

Fire Extinguisher

SAVED my LIFE says Mother

I was in my beddie-by, dreaming about a white horsie. I woke up and found the room was awful smoky.

"Daddie, come and get me," I cried. "Daddie, the house is on fire."

Daddie was asleep, but Mother heard me.

She woke up Daddie and they both ran into my room.

Daddie took me in his arms and Mother got the Pyrene that hung in the bedroom.

Daddie couldn't take me downstairs because the smoke was terrible down there.

Besides, we could see the flames downstairs.

But Mother took the Pyrene and began squirting it on the fire and pretty soon there was less smoke and we could see better and in almost no time at all the fire was out.

Then we all went downstairs and pretty soon the fire engines came—a long time after the fire was out—and then a big crowd of grown-ups gathered in front of our house.

It must have been midnight, too, I guess.

Mother said the Pyrene saved my life. I think so, too. My Daddie says he wants it on every floor of our house.

When I grow up big I am going to have a Pyrene in my house, too.

A Pyrene put on your automobile saves 15% on your car insurance.

There are thousands of Pyrenes used in factories, schools, churches, theatres, etc.

Answers to Financial Queries

"30 YEARS A READER," MISSOURI. (1) Arkansas Drainage District bonds are regarded as especially attractive for an investor situated as you are. (2) The firm is well regarded.

M. L., NEW JERSEY. (1) Nevada-Utah
(Old) stock possesses no value. (2) The Alaska Mines Securities Company is "dead" according to the Copper Hand Book. (3) I do not believe that there is any way to punish the "gang" that floated the Victoria Chief.

D. P. N., NEW YORK. The Triangle Film Corporation is a new and consequently untried venture, though the enterprise is in the hands of men long in the business and conspicuously successful. The stock could not be called "conservative," but is, we believe, highly speculative.

MRS. W. N. P., MARYLAND. (1) We have no report on the International Time Recording Company of Delaware, for the company was not incorporated until July 14, 1915. (2) Hold your Western Maryland for a better price, which we believe you will get.

G. V. H., ARKANSAS. (1) Smythe reports the Horner Sanitary Manufacturing Company as losing its charter in 1907 for non-payment of taxes.
The stock is worthless. (2) Mitchell Mining Company is practically defunct and stock is valueless.

J. T. S., PENNSYLVANIA. City of New Castle Water Company bonds of 1941 are a second mortgage issue, and, therefore, must give preference to the first mortgage bonds of 1931. The latest quotation is 60-70. We have been advised by a prominent investment banker that the bonds are in no danger.

E. C. R., INDIANA. Erie first preferred is regarded by many as possessing attractive speculative possibilities. The road has completed its double tracking operations from New York to Chicago, and is not far away from getting a large share of the grain traffic for export. Dividends on the first preferred may not be far off.

MISS D. L. P., NEW JERSEY. Many believe New York Central Stock will soon sell above par. The road made a brilliant showing in the July report, a net increase of $1,343,000 for the New York Central copper. The gain in net for the whole New York Central system was about $2,000,000. We believe you will be safe in a purchase of ten shares.

G. F. M., RHODE ISLAND. (1) Pennsylvania Railroad has no preferred stock issue. You probably mean common. This pays 6 per cent.
and at present price the investment yield will be 5½ per cent. (2) Northern Pacific at present price will yield 6½ per cent. this stock and Pennsylvania selling about at the same level. The latter is well regarded as a semi-speculative stock offering a liberal yield.

MRS. J. A. M., PENNSYLVANIA. (1) Manufacturers Light and Heat Company stock has attractive possibilities. In 1911, one per cent.
was paid; 1912, 4 per cent.; 1913, 7 per cent. and last year, 8 per cent. The stock has a par value of $50 and is listed on the Pittsburgh Stock Exchange. (2) Columbia Gas and Electric stock is said to possess somewhat attractive possibilities as a speculation. It is not an investment issue.
It will have to go a long ways before it becomes
one. No dividends are paid.

G. E. M., MASSACHUSETTS. (1) New York Central 6 per cent. debentures are an excellent semi-investment issue. (2) Go ahead—buy one $500 bond. (3) Don't sell your Central Leather. (4) Cambria Steel has had a ten-point advance—look out! (5) The New Bedford Gas and Electric Light Company will issue 2,650 shares of new stock at $200 per share. Stockholders may obtain new stock at the rate of one share of new for each five shares of old, payments to be made in four instalments of $50 each.

MRS. E. C., NEW YORK. The matter of International Steam Pump $12.50 assessment on both the preferred and common stock is one we cannot decide for you. We have nothing whatever to go by in judging the probable future career of the company. As a general proposition we do not favor the payment of assessments on stock. In many cases where assessments have been paid the stocks have eventually sold down to below the amount paid. The shares are quoted between $14 and $20 on the curb.

G. M. M., ILLINOIS. The Copper Handbook reports: "Butte and Great Falls Mining Company property not regarded favorably but management honest." The Christian Herald regards most mining stock highly speculative. Many prospect copper mining companies, taking advantage of the recent rise in copper, are seeking a market for their shares. Few will make good.

The vast majority will fall by the wayside just as the majority of mining companies have always done. An average of only one in 15,000 of the mining companies promoted in the United States in the last fifteen years has made good.

E. Y. D., VERMONT. The farm mortgage dealer of the present day is a far different proposition from that of twenty years ago. The modern dealer in farm loans is a banker, operating in a chosen field, possessed of abundant capital, surrounded by experts in legal and realty matters.
Such a firm, and today there are scores of them, is as safe to deal with as the Eastern banker who sells only railroad and industrial securities. These firms render the investor unusually efficient service, collecting and remitting interest and principal without charge, and seeing that taxes and insurance are paid. The firm you refer to stands as high as any in the country.

C. E., WASHINGTON. We are unable to get a report on the American Telegraphphone Company stock. The original company was promoted by the Sterling Debenture Corporation, members of which are now serving long sentences in the Federal penitentiary at Atlanta. Although they were not convicted of any fraud in the case of the Telegraphphone Company, it has been charged and never denied that the Sterling crowd took for commissions and expenses 80 cents of every dollar paid in by investors, thus making the company financially anemic from the start. The stock is in little demand. Local dealers in unlisted securities quote the shares at 50 cents bid, $1 asked.

MISS K. J. R., VERMONT. We can find no reference in our lists of some 200,000 mining companies to the Coal Creek Oil and Gas Company or the Cripple Creek and St. Louis Gold Mining Company. You will see the difficulty of tracing such stocks when we tell you that within the last fifteen or twenty years there have been incorporated within the United States upwards of 500,000 mining and oil companies. Today fewer than 250 companies are paying dividends.
Practically all of the balance of the 500,000 companies presumably are moribund or "dead" and their stocks unsalable or positively worthless.

O. P. N., IOWA. (1) American Locomotive common is far from investment rating. (2) American Water Works and Electric Company, the successor of the American Water Works and Guarantee Company, to which you refer, has just made its first annual report for the year ending June 30. We presume you will receive a copy of this report. In this report you will note that special funds under the terms of the supplemental mortgage had to be set aside to the amount of $500,000 and the final credit balance was only $49,152. The company expects that this fund will help the shareholders in the future, and that the disturbed financial conditions will not now permit of the payments of the dividend on the first preferred stock.

J. C. T., TENNESSEE. For more than two years we have advocated the sale of railroad bonds bearing less than 5 per cent. interest and the investment of the proceeds in good public service first mortgage 5 per cent. bonds or 6 per cent.
notes, selling at a slight discount. Many readers, as well as yourself, have followed our advice, and not regretted their action. Stability of such issues is proven by the following from the Wall Street Journal, August 19, 1915: "At the close of business January 31, 1914, the average price of the 96 Electric Light and Power bonds was 90.8, while at the close of business January 31, 1915, this had dropped only 1.4 points, or to an average price of 89.4. From January, 1915, to the close of business July 31, 1915, there was an advance of .4 point in the average price and at the close of the first twelve months of the European war the average price of the 96 bonds was 89.9, or just one point below that of January, 1914. These figures indicate the stability of utility bonds.
The maximum deviation in price for the nineteen months average was 1.1 points from the high and .9 point from the low. The Wall Street Journal in its average of 25 representative railroad bonds showed an average price July 31, 1915, of 77.21 as against an average price of 86.82 for January 31, 1914, or an average decline of 9.61 points, or 10.7 per cent. This shows that the prices of electric light and power bonds for the past nineteen months have been considerably steadier than those of steam railroad bonds."

included practically the whole of the four Gospels, with the names of the writers on the top of almost every page. Syriac scholars pronounced the older than the Diatessaron, and even considered probable that it might have based his Harmony on a similar copy of the early Gospels, as there were a number of the readings and forms of expression peculiar to his palimpsest reproduced in the Diatessaron.

Professor Harnack, writing in 1898 of the discovery, said: "As the text is completely preserved, this Syriac version is one of the important witnesses. In any case, it is extremely probable that it is the most important witness for the Gospels." Other eminent scholars have since agreed with his conclusion, that the palimpsest is the most ancient of the four oldest Syriac versions of the Gospels. Professor Rendel Harris expressed his conviction that it was superior quality to all extant copies, with very few exceptions, and that it must have been made far back in the second century. Of course, there must have been even earlier Greek versions of the Gospels, of which the palimpsest itself was a translation. It is regarded, however, as the strongest independent evidence that there has been no radical evolution of the Gospels, but that we have them now practically in all of their original fullness and purity. It is evident that such a translation for the use of a Syriac-speaking church would not have been made, unless this form of the four Gospels had been definitely accepted as the authoritative ecclesiastical record of Jesus' life and teachings, and unless it had been promulgated with apostolic approval.

On the value of archeology as a corroborator of the genuineness of the New Testament does not end here. It has revealed the fact that even in the first century A.D. the mission of spreading the doctrines of Christianity was carried on with such zeal and energy that practically every part of the New Testament, Gospels and Epistles was translated into the languages of these lands into which the early propagandists penetrated. Here again archeology proves the truth of their claims. In 1886 we found a part of a book known as the Gospel of Peter, which, though excluded afterward in the Epistles, is nevertheless a witness for the canonical Gospels. Grenfell and Hunt of Oxford University, by their discovery in 1897 at Oxyrhynchus, Egypt, of the "Logia"—the "Sayings" of Jesus—added still further to the evidence of this class. Experts have designated these "Sayings" to have been written not later than 200 A.D. They included not only selections from the Gospels, but also from the Epistle to the Romans. A fragment was also found of the Gospel of Matthew, which appeared to be a century and a half earlier than our two earliest Greek manuscripts. Yet it tallies with the familiar versions of today.

Still another remarkable find, to which Dr. Flournoy attaches great importance, was made in 1482, by Minotaphis, an eminent Greek scholar, who, one of the old libraries of the Mount Athos, among heaps of rubbish, discovered a copy of the "Philosophoumena" (or Refutation) of Hippolytus—a book designed to be a refutation of the prevailing heresies of the latter day. Hippolytus lived in the latter half of the third century and held a high position in the early Christian Church, being Bishop of the city near Rome. His book quoted freely from every book of the New Testament, and so distinguished an authority as Bunsen wrote of it that his opinions "on the paramount authority of Scripture on all matters of faith and doctrine are as strong as those of the reformers." The testimony of Hippolytus is drawn in a direct line from the last of the apostles, and clearly shows that the New Testament writings came down to this day with unbroken apostolic authority.

A direct, straightforward answer to a question asked a thousand times—

What Really Is The Minister's Job?

How far shall he go in civics, politics and city work? Is he at a discount because he is a clergyman? Who shall be his helper? "The assistant pastor is a failure. Who then?" Doctor Joseph H. Odell gives a solution, cuts honestly to the heart of the matter and tells the one great need of the ministry today which every minister will recognize.

An Actual Reproduction of
The New Grant SIX

Six-inch Longer Wheelbase—Larger, Handsomer Body Larger, Quieter Motor—Deeper, Softer Upholstery, More Complete Equipment—Everywhere Refined and Improved

The Grant SIX for the coming season is now on exhibition in the sales-rooms of hundreds of dealers. Everywhere it is attracting buyers because it so clearly and unmistakably proclaims itself a car of excess value.

Improvements

LONGER WHEEL BASE—112 inches.
LARGER BODY—Finer, handsomer, more comfortable in every way. Sidelines are higher and cushions deeper and more luxurious.
LARGER MOTOR—Cylinder diameter increased. Tappets easily adjusted.
INCREASED BREAKING AREA—Brakes cannot bind or stick.
FINER STEERING GEAR—Adjustable and irreversible. The finest quality obtainable.
LARGER GASOLINE TANK—Full 10-gallon capacity.
GASOLINE GAUGE on filler cap.
NEW DESIGN RADIATOR—Double shell type with handsome name plate. The shell absorbs all stress and strain.
REAR FENDERS set in wheel house, giving greater width to rear seat.
SPLASHER APRON in front of radiator.
POLARITY SWITCH preventing fusing or corroding of timer.
FINER WINDSHIELD Curved base type attached directly to cowl.
NON-SKID TIRES on Rear.
AMMETER—Conveniently located on instrument plate.
INSTRUMENT LAMP—Illuminating all dash equipment.

The new Grant SIX is a much larger car than its predecessor yet it embodies the same fundamental principles of construction that made last season's car so supremely successful.

It merits your investigation upon the basis of four vital features:

1. Superior chassis construction.
2. Over-head-valve motor of exclusive design.
3. Extra large, extra fine body—the largest and finest, we believe used on any car priced below a thousand dollars.
4. Proven economy of fuel, lubricant and tires, due to light weight and high efficiency motor.

The new Grant SIX has the same overhead valve motor, enlarged to compensate for the increased size of the car—more powerful, yet quieter and cleaner.

For your convenience the improvements that characterize the latest Grant SIX are listed. It is immediately apparent how greatly these improvements add to the value of the car, yet the price remains the same.

The new Grant SIX awakens your admiration because of its trim, graceful lines. It combines beauty with dignity. Its body reflects the most advanced ideals of style, yet it is not in the slightest degree common-place or faddish.

The seats are wide, deep and restful. The leg-room in both front and rear compartments is so generous that a six-foot man can ride all day in comfort. And side lines are so high that knees do not show above rail.

The dark Brewster green finish is rich and elegant. The upholstery soft, deep and supremely comfortable.

Coupled with this luxury is permanent and enduring economy.

When you know that Grant SIX owners average over 20 miles to the gallon of gasoline—900 miles to the gallon of oil; and that the Grant SIX will throttle down to 1½ miles an hour on high gear—speed up to fifty miles in a few city blocks—take any hill with ease—plough through sand without faltering; and will at all times carry five adult passengers in comfort, you will realize that the Grant SIX is a truly remarkable car.

And you will understand then why, despite our best efforts, we have never before been able to meet the demand for Grant cars. Why the factory has made money; has never needed to borrow; has no bonded or other indebtedness—and has quadrupled its production for the present season so that Grant SIXES are coming through on schedule time NOW.

This Is the Way We Wash the Clothes

Early in the Morning

The kiddies help Mother by carrying down the clothes-basket as they come to breakfast.

Mother gets Father off to business, and the kiddies off to school before she sorts the clothes and puts them to soak for about 30 minutes with Fels-Naptha Soap.

After the house is straightened up and the dishes cleared away, the dirt in the clothes is ready to wash right out with a few light rubs.

In the 30 minutes soaking Fels-Naptha has done the hard work that used to take Mother hours to do, because it makes hard rubbing unnecessary. She has all the clothes on the line, and lunch ready when the kiddies get home at noon.

And in the afternoon it is a great lark to sprinkle down the clothes while Mother has a long rest—although she is really not tired; her wash-day has been so easy.

Fels-Naptha makes washday a half-day, and is just as wonderful for all soap-and-water household tasks as it is for washing clothes.

stock, and selecting the one best suited to her needs, and anticipating the touch of brightness it will add to her kitchen. It gives zest to her afternoon. It may be the pleasantest event of her day. When Mr. Brown comes in to talk over the new furnace, or painting the house, that is a pleasant episode in his day. Now, if I can add to the pleasure of these little adventures—make them more enjoyable in my store than elsewhere—it is likely that they will be indulged in more frequently, and always in my store. In other words, if I can make every transaction in my store pleasant and satisfactory, my customers will spend more money in my store.

"SO the basis of my store policy was to give the kind of service that would build up a sentimental relationship between my customers and my store. I believed I could make my store a part, so to speak, of every family that patronized it.

"Suppose, for example that as Mrs. Brown pours her properly made tea from a tea-bob I have sold to her, she realizes that she will always have good tea that she can depend upon that tea-bob from Hammer's Hardware Store to supply good tea, always—and on Hammer to supply another pot if that one fails her. Suppose Mr. Brown realizes that his lawn-mower will always give good service; that he can depend upon me for a satisfactory look for his door, or for good paint and an artistic color scheme for his house. When Mr. and Mrs. Brown realize that the satisfactory service they get from their hardware purchases at my store is my contribution to the successful running of their household, my store becomes more and more a part of their family life."

"Did it take you long to let people know that you had this unusual service to sell?" I asked.

"No," he replied; "but it took me some time to make them believe it. Confidence is a plant of slow growth. But once they knew the value of the service they were anxious to buy it. As an example, because I sold service along with white lead, I was able to sell white lead at a profit. Perhaps you don't know that it has long been the custom for hardware stores to sell white lead at cost, on the theory that the buyer of white lead will also buy oil, brushes, etc., on which a profit can be made. Grocers handle sugar on the same basis, selling it practically at cost. I always sold white lead at a profit—just as I sold other things—and when the price came up for discussion I could easily show my customer that if I sold him white lead at cost I would have to make the profit on something else that he bought. Also I could easily convince him that I couldn't sell merchandise at cost and give him the service he wanted. As soon as I made him realize—and it wasn't hard to do—that my profit was really his insurance against dissatisfaction, his assurance of good service, he paid my price. Price is not the only factor in establishing the value of anything—not by a long shot."

"How did you let people know about your service?" I questioned.

"Of course, I advertised right from the start, to make my store known and gain the confidence of the people in the shortest possible time. I believe Emerson is credited with having said that if a man does anything better than any one else, the public will find it out and wear a path to his door, even though he live in the woods. Maybe that is true; but if that same man should advertise, the public would build a boulevard right by his front door. Of course I wanted the boulevard.

AND speaking of advertising, I soon found that I could take advantage of the advertising done in magazines and other periodicals by manufacturers and turn it to my own account. This cost little or nothing. All I had to do was to handle the advertised goods and let people know I had them, thus connecting my store with the magazine advertising. I discovered another thing about advertising, and that is that the

Smash the High Cost of Painting

If you really want to do this—there is only one safe, sure way. Not to use cheap paint—because paint, regardless of its cost, constitutes only a small proportion of your usual painting expense. It is the labor cost involved in painting and the frequency with which you have to paint that makes big painting bills. Cut down the necessity for frequent painting—use Zinolin—the paint that lasts longer than any other paint, and you will rarely have to do painting.

ZINOLIN

(non poisonous)

"Arnold-ized" zinc paint is the only all zinc paint—and zinc, as you know, is the most durable paint pigment ever discovered. Zinolin, because all zinc, lasts twice as long as part zinc paints and lead paints. It always stays beautifully glossy, gives the whitest white known and holds its colors indefinitely, things that no other paint will do. Cracking, peeling, chalking or blistering are unheard of with Zinolin. Yet Zinolin costs no more to use. The Arnold secret process, which has made Zinolin possible and permitted pure zinc to be used outside for the first time, is the talk and marvel of all paint authorities from coast to coast. It is easy to understand why they all speak of Zinolin as "The Wonder Paint."

small-town dealer has no adequate medium through which to build a local reputation for any article in competition with an article of national reputation. I know because I tried it. It is too hard a job and too expensive. There is a prestige attached to an article that has the same reputation in Cleveland, Cincinnati, New York, San Francisco and Linden, that can never be secured for an article with a local reputation only. There is a psychological force to a national reputation that many dealers do not appreciate. My customers in Linden, for instance, would much rather have a brand of tools that is known as the best everywhere in the United States than one that is not known outside of Linden, even though the local brand is as good as the other.

"It didn't take me long to see the advantage and profit of handling advertised goods. The maker's reputation stands behind mine, and he is doing the advertising in my behalf as well as for himself. There is nothing advertised in the hardware line that will sell in our town that I don't stock and display at once. It is a great thing frequently to give people something new to say about you and by getting the novelties in advance of my competitors, and advertising them, I get a lot of free advertising by word of mouth, and a reputation for being the most progressive dealer in town. It is worth while to keep people talking about you if you want their patronage.

"I recently heard the advertising manager of a successful automobile manufacturer say that motor cars are sold by tea-table and restaurant gossip. He tries to put into his advertising the things that people talk about in their conversation every day, so they will naturally say the things he wants them to say about his car—and saying them, they will come to believe them and make others believe them. Since his advertising is tremendously successful I guess he had the right idea.

"But to get back to my first days in my store.

"Also, I put into practice some plans I had by which my clerks could wait upon a customer in the quickest time. I wanted to save the customers' time and do the work with as few clerks as possible. For everything that came in a variety of sizes, such as nails, tacks, screws, drills, etc., I had a sample card or board on which one of each size was arranged. This saved dragging out a number of packages to determine the size when the customer was uncertain.

Then I always kept some of the most commonly used sizes of nails done up in packages of from one to five pounds, so that when a customer asked for a few pounds of nails he wouldn't have to wait until we raked them out of a keg, weighed them, and wrapped them up. We simply picked up a package and handed it out. These short cuts made a hit with our customers and saved me money in clerk hire. And they gave people something to say about my different way of doing things.

"I think I said before that I believed a hardware stock could be made to be the most inclusive retail stock. This is especially true in the smaller towns, where there isn't enough trade to support some of the specialty stores that you find in the cities, such as electrical stores and stores that deal exclusively in lighting fixtures. I had a chance to expand my stock before I had had it a month. A man who was remodeling an old home and wiring it for electricity came in to ask me for information about city firms that handled fixtures. I told him I could supply these fixtures, and would be glad to help him in planning some artistic design that would harmonize with the arrangement and style of his house. He jumped at my offer. I got busy with a Chicago concern that designs and makes fixtures, and when the house was finished it was the most artistically lighted home in town, and I had saved the owner some money. That made talk about my store, and fixtures became one of my permanent and profitable lines."

"You didn't wait for business to come into your store," I remarked.

"I did not," said he. "I went after it everywhere. And here is another point that most dealers don't appreciate. There are a lot of things that can be

A Blessing in Every Family

We have been members of the Christian Herald family for many years, and our love for it, and trust in it has never grown less. As the years roll on, we feel that we cannot part with it or do less for it than we have done to extend its influence, for it really is a blessing in every family where it finds a home and is carefully read. We wish it might have a circulation according to its worth. We hope to have it with us as long as we live.

sell better in the customer's home than in the store. Kerosene or gasoline stoves, for instance, or fireless cookers, or suction sweepers. Articles like that I put into the home for a demonstration every chance I get, and let the customer sell it to herself. A lot of such things are just like telephones or automobiles. You think you don't need them, if you don't have them; but once you get them, you think you can't live without them."

"It looks to me," I said, "as though you give about as much thought and effort to creating wants as to supplying them."

"You've guessed it," he replied, "and I believe the effort spent that way makes the difference between an average business and a profitable business like mine. Furthermore, it is just as important to know what motives make people buy as to know what they buy. For instance, the average man will spend money more freely for a hobby than for his actual needs. He may dicker for a month about the cost of a furnace to heat his house and then spend one hundred and fifty dollars in a minute for a shotgun, if he happens to be a 'fan' on shooting. Once I realized that fact, I began to cultivate hobbies—for other people. I organized a gun club for one thing, and being a pretty good shot myself, people generally looked upon me as an authority on guns and ammunition, and my store soon became headquarters for such supplies. I also organized a skating club; and for those who did not go in much for sports I got up a manual training class. All of these meant more business from people who made hobbies of these things."

"I should think that other dealers must profit also from your activities," I suggested.

"Of course they do," he said; "and I am glad they do. It is my opinion that a man kills his own game when he tries to take all the benefits of his work. He must do his share for the general good or he soon becomes an undesirable citizen. I like to feel that much of my work helps the whole town. That is what I call enlightened selfishness, for what helps my community helps me. I am a part of the community."

"You certainly seem to enjoy your business," said I.

"Yes," said he; "I often say, to paraphrase one of our ambassadors, 'If I couldn't be who I am, I'd rather be some other hardware dealer.'"

Amarilly and Her Friends

WE told you lately about Amarilly of Clothes-Line Alley, the wonderful little heroine of the slums, whose life story begins in the Christian Herald, Oct. 6. You'll like Amarilly amazingly and you'll learn to love her friends too. The one thing that saved Amarilly from being absurdly commonplace was her lively imagination. This gave to her the rare and delightful faculty of always looking on the bright side of things. It was her sunny philosophy that pulled her out of every difficulty.

"We're just astubbin' our toes on luck," she would exclaim, as new surprises and good things came her way; but they were really the product of her own sunny temper.

You will read with an interest that will surprise you, how this imaginative little maid scrubbed the floors of the Barlow Theatre, was taught to sew blue rag carpets by Miss King, her beautiful patron, and to set the table, cook and wash and iron fine laces, and to keep house for a "Boarder," and how she finally contrived to get something of an education. Her development was like the unfolding of a graceful flower. Out of the little drudge of poverty, in rags and dirt, there emerged at last a bright, intelligent, wonderfully clever and resourceful woman. There is a good deal of romance about Amarilly, but there's lots of fun and human nature.

"Amarilly" of Clothes-Line Alley will appear serially in the Christian Herald beginning with the first issue in October. That is but two weeks hence. If you have not already sent in your renewal you should do so AT ONCE.

OUR RELIEF WORK IN SERBIA

MISS SYBIL EDEN, a member of the Christian Herald Relief Committee for the Widows and Orphans of the War, lately organized at Nish, Serbia, writes of general conditions in that country at the present time. She says, "The need in the newly acquired province, known as New Serbia, is great. The people are starving and have little clothing. There are numbers of orphans with no one to look after them though the various church charities are doing their best. The church societies, the Agricultural College and the Monastir missions are trying to cope with overwhelming conditions. These are all on the outskirts of old Serbia."

"So far disease has been fairly well controlled, but Dr. Klotz and Dr. Baer, who are traveling with us, say that with the coming of the cold weather typhus will break out anew."

"There are 4,000 babies with no one to care for them, and over 20,000 orphans dependent on charity. The need of the country is schools where these little ones can be taught to be self-supporting; and civilian hospitals are also greatly needed. Everything is done for the soldiers, nothing to speak of for the civilian population. There is room for seven or eight large orphanages in different parts of the country, feeding the children and teaching them trades: farming, weaving and domestic service. The immediate need, however, is relief for the starving."

"Sir Ralph Paget (who is a member of the Christian Herald Relief Committee) has stayed on to help in just such work as you plan to do for the widows and orphans. Dr. Strong, of the Rockefeller Foundation (another member), is especially serviceable, as he knows every inch of the ground. Miss Grouitch is a sister of the Serbian minister of the Interior and has devoted herself for years to the welfare of the women and children in that country. M. Marinkovitch is a lawyer who has devoted his life and fortune to repairing the devastating effects of the war. Dr. Edward Clark is an evangelical minister in charge of the Monastir Mission and Miss Mitchell is a relative of Anson Phelps Stokes, with a practical knowledge of relief work."

The AUTUMN ROAD

By
Margaret E. Sangster Jr.

Down the road where the dust lies white,
Sunbeams dance and my heart is light,
O'er my head gleams a sky of blue,
God's own angels are smiling through;
All of life is agleam and bright,
Down the road where the dust lies white.

Down the road where the leaves blow down
Glowing jewels from the autumn's crown, Fairies call and their voices stray
Light as foam on the gleaming way.
Scarlet, yellow and somber brown,
Down the road where the leaves blow down.

Down the road by the laughing stream,
All the tints of the rainbow gleam;
Golden flowers with waving heads,
Flaming orange and throbbing reds;
Asters grouped in a purple dream,
Down the road by the laughing stream.

Down the road where the sunbeams creep
Past the crest of the hill to sleep,
Birds are breathing their twilight call,
Peace of God is around us all.
Sweet content in my heart lies deep,
Down the road where the sunbeams creep.

Down the road at the close of day,
Man-wrought buildings are far away;
All the fears of a crowded earth
Slip away in a tender mirth;
God has meant that his children stray
Down the road at the close of day.

Down the road where the shadows fall
Gray as ghosts on the old stone wall,
Memories stand, and their faces fair Turn my way, and they murmur "Where?"
Love and sorrow beyond recall Stand and smile where the shadows fall.

Down the road where the dust lies white,
Slow I walk, but my heart is light;
Smallest blossom and highest tree
Bend to pray—and are one with me;
Night is coming—a perfect night—
Down the road where the dust lies white.

Questions and Answers

Mrs. C. S., Spokane, Wash. An unsympathetic Christian is an anomaly. Jesus was all tenderness and compassion. "He went about doing good," the Gospels tell us, and his followers cannot be true to their Master unless they follow his example. We should be careful, however, as to judging by outward appearances. We personally know a number of good people who take special delight in doing good in secret, that they may not be tempted to count the applause of men. In the church family the spirit of helpfulness should be constantly cultivated. Visiting the sick and the afflicted, carrying cheer and assistance to the homes of poverty, encouraging the feeble brother or sister to higher effort, giving a lift to those who are overburdened and heavy laden, looking after the needs, moral and material, of the neglected children or the overworked mothers—these and many similar cases are the very ones the church folks should search out and assist. In many churches there are organizations especially for such work, and they are rendering splendid service. A member who thinks that paying pew-rent, attending service and giving to the collection is all the duty God wants of us is woefully mistaken. We should give the best we have and give ourselves with it. The church should be a friendly society for mutual cooperation in Christian helpfulness. Members should know each other, visit each other and plan their campaigns together "In His Name." Many a cold, selfish, unsympathetic church has been quickened into new life by the influence and example of a few devoted and courageous souls who tactfully led their fellow members into paths of Christian service, where they could feel that they were doing good. The prescription is not new, though it is often neglected or forgotten.

W. E. W., Bogalusa, La. "Perdition" is the final ruin or destruction of the thing under consideration. Thus we speak of the perdition of cities and nations; "the present perdition," which is the lost state of the soul until it becomes a partaker in present salvation; perdition as physical calamity, and perdition as the ultimate fate of the unregenerate and impenitent wicked after death. The passage in II Peter 3:9 and many others give assurance that God does not desire that any should perish, and that his gift of salvation and eternal life is open to all who truly repent, turn from their sins, and ask and receive the divine forgiveness. All that we know concerning the fate of those dying in sin is disclosed in the Scriptures. No one has the authority to go beyond this, and to assert that perdition means the absolute annihilation of the soul, or that it means only a temporary separation from and loss of all those joys and privileges which a gracious God has granted to the penitent and redeemed. Of one thing we may be sure: the Judge of all the earth will do right. He is incapable of injustice, and we may safely rest in the assurance that whatever judgment is meted out will not be unjust. He knows all our frailties and our weaknesses, our trials and temptations, and he will not be less merciful than an earthly father would be.

Mrs. W. H. W., Gainesville, Ga. There are many expressions in Scripture that are figurative or symbolical, and which are not to be interpreted literally. Again, there are passages relating to the spiritual world which, in order to be comprehensible to our minds, must be expressed in human terms. The passage in Rev. 7:17 belongs to this class, and conveys to our minds in the only terms we can understand that there will be neither sorrow nor tears in heaven. See I Cor. 15:41-45, in which Paul tells of the natural and the spiritual body—the latter not conformed to the lower and animal life, but to the higher and spiritual life. Flesh and blood (verse 50) cannot inherit the kingdom. The passage in Revelation simply means that all the old earth sorrows and persecutions, the thirst, the heat, the hunger, cannot enter that heavenly realm.

Emma T., Loyce, Fla. Hospitality is a virtue which may be exercised on all proper occasions. This does not mean, however, that it should be so exercised as to turn the Lord's day into a day of feasting and entertainment. We have a distinct recollection of various pleasant and profitable occasions, when some visiting minister or elder was a welcome guest over Sunday. Paul (Col. 2:16) warns against laying undue stress on formal observances, and a proper hospitality, which will not interfere with the spirit and duties of the day, is not regarded as in itself objectionable.

E. F. G. M., Cooperstown, N. Y. The public debt of the United States on October 1, 1914, was as follows: Interest-bearing debt (bonds, postal savings bank deposits, etc.), $968,825,550; debt on which interest has ceased since maturity, $1,544,620,26; debt bearing no interest, $369,353,079.40; certificates and treasury notes (paper money), $1,469,583,869; total, $2,809,262,118.66. This is partly offset by cash in the treasury to the amount of $1,747,510,021.18, leaving a net debt of $1,061,752,097.48. A rapidly growing part of the national debt consists of deposits in the postal savings banks, which represent the results of thrifty habits of the people, and it is not desirable that they should be discontinued. But part of the debt consists of bonds which mature at given dates.

A. E., Bradley, S. D. There are doubtless some people, possibly a good many, who would be glad to have an excuse for doing on Sunday certain kinds of work which their conscience tells them should not be done on the Lord's day, and could very well be performed during the week. A farmer, for instance, looking over his cornfield on Sunday, might say: "I'll take it in now lest a storm come along and level it." From the right point of view, that would be no reason at all. The attitude of the Christian Church is that while "works of necessity or of mercy" are justifiable on Sunday, the day should be kept free from our ordinary avocations, which can and ought to be attended to on weekdays.

Mrs. A. L. W., Oklahoma City. A "Sabbath day's journey," the distance which according to Jewish ecclesiastical law might be traveled without violating the sanctity of the day, was approximately 2,000 yards, or 12,000 handbreadths. The distance was not to be measured from any point according to whim, but in obedience to definite and minute rules. It is assumed that the distance was originally fixed in relation to the distance between the ark and the tents of the people in the wilderness (Joshua 3:4). To assemble near the ark was a duty on the Sabbath, therefore walking that distance was no violation of the day and it was taken as the measurement of a lawful Sabbath day's journey. The spirit and purpose of the prohibition were to forbid traveling on ordinary business on that day, and to afford rest for beasts of burden, as well as men. The Mount of Olives is seated in Acts 1:12 to be a Sabbath day's journey from Jerusalem.

J. C., Philadelphia. The books that have been written concerning the prophecies in Daniel, Ezekiel, Jeremiah, Isaiah and Revelation would fill a good-sized library. To the reverent study of the prophetic writings no one can reasonably object, but the exploitation of a mass of conjectural interpretations, hardly any two alike, simply produces confusion. The present war will no doubt be responsible for a number of new books on the subject. John (in Rev. 13:18), clearly implies that the prophecies will yield their secrets only to those who are made wise with

The Good Old Hymns

THERE'S lots of music in 'em, the hymns of long ago;
An' when some gray-haired brother sings the ones I used to know
I sorter want to take a hand—I think of days gone by—
"On Jordan's stormy banks I stand and cast a wistful eye."

THERE'S lots of music in 'em—those dear, sweet hymns of old,
With visions bright of lands of light and shining streets of gold;
And I hear 'em ringing—singing, where memory dreaming stands,
"From Greenland's icy mountains to India's coral strands."

WE hardly needed singin' books in those old days; we knew
The words, the tunes, of every one the dear old hymn-book through!
We had no blaring trumpets then, no organs built for show;
We only sang to praise the Lord "from whom all blessings flow."

AN' so I love the dear old hymns, and when my time shall come—
Before the light has left me and my singing lips are dumb—
If I can only hear 'em, then I'll pass without a sigh,
"To Canaan's fair and happy land, where my possessions lie!"
—Anonymous.

M. V. B. P., Salem, Mass., writes: "There have been several changes in our calendar proposed, before those mentioned in the Christian Herald, 28 of April and 23 of June of this year. A year of thirteen months, each beginning on Sunday and having twenty-eight days, is a good scheme. It leaves only two days out of commission. Those days, however, can be easily utilized. Insert a day between Tuesday and Wednesday of the Fourth of July week, and make it an independent day, without number, monumental to the 'Spirit of 76.' The other day comes only once in four years, and is known as leap day, and to dispose of it we may follow the old Roman idea, and write it with December 31. The Roman calendar, in leap years, denoted their six calends, our 24th and 25th of February, by sexto calendas Martii, and called the latter day bissextus (double sextus). So if we should write the leap day with December 31 and designate it December 31-2, we would find it easy as the Romans did and in all ways convenient. But after all, this old method of writing dates has served me in business life for more than sixty years, and I have no desire to see my old friend supplanted."

H. J. R., Oakfield, N. Y. The words "Kingdom of God" and "Kingdom of Heaven," are used in several senses in the Scriptures, as has already been pointed out in the Mail-Bag. These include (1) the Kingdom where God reigns, (2) the Kingdom to be established at the second coming of Christ, and (3) the present Kingdom of which Jesus spoke in Luke 17:21—"The Kingdom of God is within you." This is interpreted as meaning that those who have accepted him here as Lord and Saviour and who follow him in faith and loving service have already begun in his kingdom the life that is eternal. Illuminative passages on the subject are: Matt. 4:17, 23; 10:7; 16:19, 28; 12:28; 8:12; 6:33; Mark 1:14, 15; 4:30-32; 10:15; 11:10; Luke 10:9, 11; 17:21; 18:17; Rom. 14:17; Heb. 12:28.

spiritual understanding (i.e. inspiration). One of the ablest commentators writes: "The prophecies are intended to stimulate reverent inquiry, not to gratify idle, speculative curiosity; and when the event shall have been fulfilled, they will show the divine wisdom of God, who ordered all things in harmonious relations, and left neither the times nor the ways to haphazard." Hence, the right attitude toward all prophecy is to study and watch and to wait with patience for God's own good time to make them plain.

G. B., Binghamton, N. Y. 1. The passage in Matt. 17:20 is a figurative illustration of the power of faith in God, which under his will can accomplish results that are humanly regarded as impossible. The last clause of the verse makes this clear. Although the obstacle were mountainous, it would yield to the prayer of faith. 2. The parable of the rich man and Lazarus is the only one in which a proper name is employed. While the rich man is not named in the Scriptures, tradition has preserved the story and gives his name in one version as Dobruk and in another as Nimeusis. Of course these are not to be accepted as authentic. Commentators agree that the Saviour was simply describing types of men, and not specific cases.

G. H. R., Toronto, Can., writes: "Does civilization offer any improvement on the customs of our early ancestors? As the primitive savages superstitiously threw their offspring into the molten crater as a sacrifice of atonement to quiet the anger of their gods, so do the moderns of today, with the same easiness of belief, cast their offspring into that hell-hole (war) to satisfy their gods of profit and empire. Humanity needs more of character, less of discipline, and obedience only to the command, love one another." Our correspondent is unduly pessimistic. Evil has grown, but the good has grown in greater degree, and we believe that it is the divine will that the good shall ultimately triumph, and that the nations will yet turn to God.

Helen G., one of our young lady readers in Oak Harbor, Ohio, writes telling how the Christian Herald is read in that neighborhood. "I've let seven of my neighbors read my copies. When the U. B. (United Brethren) Church, three and one-half miles from us, made me a member of the Good Literature Committee, and I taking paper across the river to the church, where they have a Young People's meeting of about eighty members, and all seem to enjoy them. We boys in progress. We live near the marsh land in fact we have diked two farms. I have a Sunday school class of the ages of ten to fifteen and we take one topic each Sunday. One of the topics was: 'What is the best thing to pray for?' and another 'How to be Saved.' These young friends are in earnest and will be heard from in Christian work by and by."

Miscellaneous

Puzzled Inquirer, Coventry, R. I. The question is controversial. Each denomination is entitled to its own views on matters that relate to forms and ordinances. The chief point is that all should be in agreement concerning the essentials of the faith.

Mrs. N. C., San Francisco, Calif. Our temples are, or should be, temples of the Holy Spirit. As such we should strive to make them fitting temples, free from the impurities of sin and every form of vice or indulgence. We are not to judge others by our own standards.

J. B., Germantown, Pa. Mohammedan census of a total Islamic following throughout the world of 340,000,000 are doubtless exaggerated. More accurate statistics give a total of 221,820,000, divided as follows: Africa 51,000,000, Asia 2,000,000, Europe 3,800,000, Oceania 25,000,000, North America 15,000, South America 10,000,000.

L. B. P., Pecatonica, Ill. There is no reference to automobiles in the Bible, although various passages have been quoted at times without idea in view. Nahum 2:4 describes the wildsh of the gleaming chariots in battle, and Isaiah 34:6 pictures the terrific haste of the angels in coming against Judea.

C. D., Amsterdam, N. Y., writes: "I reced the Flag and the Declaration and like them very much. It is a fine large flag and I had it for the Fourth of July. I hope 'Old Glory' will live for peace amid all this struggle. May God bless our country to keep the Flag clean and free from stain." A beautiful sentiment and especially appropriate at this time.

J. W., Quincy, Ill. In the main, your letter is controversial. We agree with you in the conclusion that the people of this nation appear to have been drifting away from God, and that is a time when we would do well to examine our own hearts, lest we should be vain enough to imagine that our superior virtues will exempt us from troubles such as those that have overtaken Europe. It is a time for humiliation and repentance.

A Subscriber, Indiana. Solomon's temple was dedicated about 1006 B. C. and was destroyed on the capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar in 586 B. C. A new temple was built after his return from the Babylonian captivity. Another was built by Herod the Great shortly before the birth of Christ. The ruins of this latter temple still exhibit (says one authority) in some places, what seem to be the foundations laid by Zerubbabel, and beneath them the more massive structures of Solomon."

Dr. Morgan and Mr. Thomas Leading the "March Around Jerusalem"

Dr. Ballard and Dr. Wilson Leading the Ministers' Division of the March

It is always interesting, in observing any sort of a campaign, to try to fix the minute at which the tide of victory turned. In every struggle the issue is determined, not by the last effort, but by a stand that was taken, a word that was said, a thing that was done, some time before the end.

I looked for some days as though the Ocean Grove Camp Meeting this year might not be a real spiritual triumph. When the meeting was nearly half over, the Asbury Park Press in an article headed "Converts are Reluctant at Ocean Grove Revival" said: "So far there has been practically none of the old-time revival spirit and public renunciation of sin that have attended former camps." The next night, Wednesday, there were about fifty seers; Thursday and Friday there were still others; but there was, for all that, an air of disappointment, a feeling of apprehension that the season of 1915 might mark a triumph at Ocean Grove of the "old-time religion." There had been numerous "decisions" in the Young People's meetings and the children's meetings, but the fervent evangelistic atmosphere which used to pulsate at Ocean Grove, sometimes throughout every service of every day of the camp, was not powerfully felt.

One Saturday afternoon, Mrs. Elizabeth Smith was leading the Consecration Meeting in the Temple. She had asked for testimonies, brief testimonies; and for many minutes it appeared that her commands would not be obeyed. The speakers would not be brief, and they would not testify. They would preach, they would exhort, they would advise they would do everything but declare in simple quick fashion their spiritual state on this particular afternoon. Mrs. Smith had to scold a little. She said that she really believed the spiritual forces which were opposed to the Gospel strove in every way to sidetrack Ocean Grove from the original purpose for which it was established and to thwart the plans of the Holy Spirit. The one sure road to victory was by testimony—testimony to the present, satisfying experience of full salvation. That cleared the atmosphere, and people began to tell briefly, with happy voices, of their present blessings. Still there had been no deep thrill throughout the audience.

Then a woman arose whose earnest face showed triumph, gladness—and through all a trace of sweet sorrow. She told how she had been born again, how she had received her Pentecost; then said that recently God had led her through deep grief.

"He took my big boy, ten years old," she said. "But the Comforter abides."

A THRILL of sympathy, of faith, of gladness, of assurance, of triumph shot through the assembly. The great hymn seemed to start itself.

"The Comforter Has Come."

And the real victory of the 1915 camp meeting was assured. The remainder of that particular meeting is indescribable. If it could be adequately written, the record would fit into the book of Acts, without a marring seam. It might be said of it: "With great power gave the apostles witness of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus; and great grace was upon them all."

Sister "Cassie Smith," who was, years ago, wonderfully healed in body as well as transcendently blessed in soul, gave her personal testimony to the power of God. A backslider told of the troubled conscience that had tormented him during the camp, almost driving him from Ocean Grove, but testified that that morning he had found Christ again. And the ring of triumphant gladness in his voice made it impossible to doubt that what he said was true. A mission leader told of his entering into the blessing of perfect love, speaking almost in the language of Paul of the "heavenly light" that flashed over him, causing him to lie insensible for hours.

Will Thomas, who had been assisting Mr. Rodeheaver in the camp-meeting music, stepped forward and sang:

"I can tell you when,
I can tell you where
The power fell on me."

And from the spirit in which the congregation joined in the refrain, it will be strange if some do not look back to that moment as the time that the "power" came to them.

Patty Watkins and her husband sang "Yes, Lord," the congregation joining in the refrain.

Dr. Biddle, of Altoona, Pa., gave the Bible reading, and at the meeting's close many sought the blessing of a clean heart. There was a different spirit about the camp after that service.

Sunday was a busy day—sunrise meeting, love feast, sermon, beach meetings, then the great last meeting in the auditorium.

DR. GEORGE WOOD ANDERSON, the evangelist, preached about the three Hebrew boys who would not bow down at the sound of the music to the king's golden image. "The world does not say," he declared, "at the sound of the lash bow down," but "at the sound of the music bow down." That cry comes to every member of the church, to young women and young men—at the sound of the music bow down!" The way of sin is made alluring, easy.

The Hebrew boys replied to the king's threat, "Our God is able." "Have you got such a grip on God as that?" asked the evangelist.

Telling of the destruction of those who put the young men into the fire, Dr. Anderson said: "The most dangerous thing in the world is to spend our time criticizing and scorching others. It's better to be thrust into a fiery furnace yourself than to help thrust some one else in. It's spiritual death to one who tries to put another into the fiery furnace."

The boys who stood up were delivered. Those men who bowed down were destroyed. "The pathway of worldliness is filled with the bodies of the dead. The dead are those who bow down. He who bows down puts his head to the block."

Now the young men are in the fire. The king is watching.

"One, Two, Three—Four!"

"One, Two, Three—Another!"

"The form of the fourth is like the Son of God."

The world will never see Jesus Christ unless the people stand up for him. When people do stand up for him, that very moment he is seen.

There is no hurt to the young men. Earth holds no furnace that can hurt the soul. The fire had no effect upon these young men. Why? Because they stood up!

Then the evangelist made an irresistible appeal to the unconverted, in the name of their fathers and mothers, to stand up for Christ. Tears were upon many faces as he pictured old home scenes, making the fathers and mothers live again and stretch out their hands to boys and girls who are not being true to the old home religion.

Say: "I will not bow down, because if I don't bow down here I can stand in the presence of the King. I'm going to stand up for God, no matter what it costs."

Then they sang—"Just As I Am, Without One Plea." Then: "I Am Coming, Lord." Then other sweet hymns of invitation. Dr. C. M. Boswell and Dr. W. H. Morgan continued the evangelist's exhortation and led the altar service. And the people began to come—down first one aisle, then another. A Japanese lady came and knelt at the altar, later a negro girl; and an athletic young man strode forward, moistening his hand as if about to pitch a ball.

TWO militiamen made their way down the aisle, led by a young man in civilian dress, and though it was Sunday night and a revival meeting, the audience applauded. The young men knelt with the rest at the altar, "bowing down" to the Saviour, not to the spirit of the world. A bright-faced young woman led two seekers forward. A young school-girl came alone. A little boy who had given his heart to Christ at the children's meeting on the previous Sunday brought his father and mother to the altar.

While new seekers were coming, the choir and the helpers sang hymns to lead the faith of those who knelt in prayer.

"O Glorious Fountain."

"Hallelujah, 'Tis Done."

At the request that all raise their hands who had unsaved friends for whom they wished prayer to be made, practically every one of the thousands who had remained for the after service made this sign.

Then all at the altar rose from their knees, and choir, clergymen, helpers, converts, audience, sang:

"O Happy Day That Fixed My Choice."

It was the old-time religion, but we were suddenly reminded that we were in the twentieth century when either Dr. Boswell or Dr. Morgan, looking down into the faces of the young men who had just found the Saviour, shouted, as the old hymn of triumph rolled forth.

"Sing it, fellows!"

Dr. Boswell called for the "class-meeting verse," and it was sung with a will.

"'Tis done, the great transaction's done."

It might have been feared that after this great service, the Monday morning exercises of the camp meeting would prove an anti-climax. But they were hardly that. First, the beautiful service of baptizing of children in the auditorium, then the reports from the various leaders—Dr. Morgan for the young people's meeting, reporting that at one service alone one hundred and twenty young persons took their stand for Christ. Mr. Joseph A. Hudson reported for the Sunday school and for the children's meeting. Dr. Frank L. Wilson reported for the great Bible class he had taught Sunday afternoons in the auditorium; Dr. Henry Wheeler for the Holiness Meeting; Mrs. Smith for the Consecration Meeting; Miss Helen Gertrude Rumsey for the Young People's Twilight Service.

OTHER reports were made; then came the famed "March Around Jerusalem." "Rody," as he is lovingly called by his multitudinous admirers, was not present. He had led the camp meeting music until early Sunday evening, when he had started on his westward journey to join Evangelist Sunday in the Omaha campaign. There had been another gospel procession Saturday evening when Rodeheaver with his trombone led the chorus in a march from the North End Pavilion, where a song service had been held, down the Board Walk and up Ocean Pathway to the auditorium. The singing throughout had been jubilant and beautiful. The Paterson choir had relieved the Ocean Grove choir for one day, and the children had led the singing on Thursday evening. The Criterion Quartet had sung effectively at many services and a special quartet of famous composers had pleased the audiences at one day's services. And now the last triumphant songs were to be sung as the camp meeting company began their march through the buildings and grounds which had been the scene of Pentecostal blessings. Dr. Morgan and Mr. Thomas, with a cornetist, led the chorus and the first contingent of the procession. They marched down the aisle of the auditorium to the Tabernacle, where the holiness meetings and young people's twilight services had been held, on to Thornley Chapel, over to the Temple, where the young people's services and the consecration meetings had been held. Dr. Ballard and Dr. Wilson led the company of ministers and the rest of the workers and friends, stopping for a word of prayer in each of the buildings. Song after song rose as the marchers continued their way: "Beulah Land," "He Walks With Me," "Nearer, My God, to Thee," and, again and again, "We're Marching to Zion." From the Temple the procession crossed to the famous model of present-day Jerusalem, marching around this, passing on to the auditorium, up the aisle to the platform. When the first contingent of the procession had reached the platform and stood, singing, the ministers appeared at the auditorium entrance and marched down the aisle. The choir welcomed them with "O Beulah Land, Sweet Beulah Land!" It was hard to stop the singing. Ministers and choir were now on the platform, the other marchers crowded about the altar rail and took their places in the auditorium, while many others joined in. They sang again "We're Marching to Zion," then "O Happy Day That Fixed My Choice." Then the closing hymn, the mighty organ leading the thousands of jubilant hearts who reviewed the blessings of the past days and looked forward to a year of triumphant service.

"God Be With You Till We Meet Again."

Dr. Ballard declared the camp meeting closed, pronounced the benediction, and Clarence Reynolds made his great organ sing thunderously once: "Praise God from Whom All Blessings Flow," while the happy Christians took their leave of or another.

SOME will remember one word or song of this meeting above another; some will believe that this or that testimony or exhortation made the required connection between the energizing Holy Spirit and the waiting congregations. We can all be sure that "Sophie," with her irresistible testimony, helped the powers of light; we know that "Sunny Jim" Johnson with his inimitable combination of song and testimony brought spiritual gladness to many a life; we know that "Happy Day," the old saint of Western New Jersey, cheered many a heart; we know that the railroad men with their sturdy testimony to the power and gladness of salvation stirred many a will. We know evangelists, ministers, workers, singers, all helped to lead souls to the place of blessing. But I am thinking as I close, as was thinking when I began, of a quiet-voiced mother who said: "He took my big boy, ten years old. But the Comforter abides."

The Only Woman Rural Mail-Carrier

THERE is none. That is, there is no "only one," and yet there appears now and then in the press a most engaging little story about such an individual. Such a story was mentioned some time ago in our own pages, and we were delighted with the promptness with which the non-existence of an "only" woman mail-carrier was proven by our correspondents.

An innocent misstatement such as that was can sometimes do a world of good. In this case it has brought out interesting information about this phase of our great postal system. For one thing, the Post Office Department itself is not aware of the actual number of women carriers in the rural delivery service, but estimates that there are about one hundred and fifty. This is a very trifling percentage of the total number of carriers, 43,652 in 1914; but it seems safe to say that a high percentage of the romance which the rural delivery service is supposed to contain will be found along these one hundred and fifty routes.

Possibly, just possibly, these faithful messengers of the government are not much concerned about the romantic side of their calling. To them it is doubtless a very businesslike proceeding, and they are willing to leave the flowery notions about the work to us who think of the R. F. D. service as symbolized by a placid white horse, a comfortable-looking, enclosed and easy-going conveyance, and a daily jaunt through leafy lanes and over purling brooks, with occasional stops at cheery white farmhouses where creamy milk and ripe gossip are exchanged for the copy of the Christian Herald, or, more's the pity, some other publication, a postal card or a mysterious package. We who are strong in imagination, however, do not trouble to visualize those leafy lanes when the trees are bare, the fences hidden by snow, the brook a winding streak of ice, and the farmhouses maddening suggestions of warmth and cheer that rural mail-carriers cannot stop to share.

ONE of the longest of these "romantic" routes has for five years been in charge of Mrs. Verna Martinson, according to a correspondent from Neodesha, Kan., a route of twenty-five miles. Mrs. Martinson substituted for her husband, a Spanish War veteran, during his last illness, and afterward assumed full charge. It surely must require courage above the average to start out on such a trip as that; perhaps not every day, though, for some of the routes are tri-weekly. Then there is Katie T. Bennett, who for ten years has had the Longmont, Colo., Route No. 2, and for the past five years has been trying to use a car during the six months of the year when the roads will permit. Colorado, too, must have its attractions for the venturesome, and yet the impression lingers that Mrs. or Miss Bennett (we are under the disadvantage of not knowing which title is correct in this case) attacks it not for the romance that is in it, but for a good healthful, useful business occupation. Another member of this valiant company whose name was promptly sent to us at the appearance of our first mention of the subject is Mrs. Grace Baldwin, Mattoon, Ill., who, like Mrs. Martinson, at first substituted for her husband and then became the regular carrier. This Illinois route is a daily one of about twenty miles, and Mrs. Baldwin uses an automobile to her very great credit, be it said. One friend worth having along a route running out of Merrimack, Wis., tells us of Miss Edna Fuller, who in the many years that she has been an R. F. D. carrier has never missed a day, "and does not weigh much over one hundred pounds." We admire the spunk of this one hundred pounds of true womanhood! Do you know that on a large number of daily routes of eight and a half to twelve hours each, more than twenty thousand pieces and more than twenty-five hundred pounds of mail are handled by the carriers each month?

What is said to be one of the longest and loneliest rural mail routes in Mississippi is in charge of Mrs. Carrie D. King, who has been in the service for the past twelve years, states another correspondent. As an additional touch to the harrowing description of the route, it is stated that the state penitentiary is but one of the thrilling spots that must be passed. The writer would like to take that trip with Mrs. King—he would rather take it with Mrs. King than alone, for evidently she is much superior to any thrill that can be produced by any lurking terror on that route, or she would not have traveled it for twelve long years. From Williamsport, Ind., comes the information that Mrs. Anna Hunter has for the last ten years covered a route of twenty-five miles, "and she has done splendid work," adds our informant. We believe that, and believe it of every one of these one hundred and fifty or more women carriers. The fact is rather remarkable that most of the letters which come to us tell of women who are on very long routes and have served for many years. Mrs. Louise Middaugh, we are told, has been carrier out of Ames, Neb., for eleven years, her route being a daily one of twenty-seven and one-half miles. Last winter, through snow, rain and mud, she missed only four days. That is a record to be proud of, and we cannot help hoping that the prosperous fathers along these routes that are in the charge of women do not forget such service when Christmas comes around.

WE rather hoped to hear from about every woman carrier, but since we have not, we will at least bow all round the compass with it in hand to these splendid workers of the Post Office service. It may of incidental interest to mention that since the beginning of the rural delivery service in 1896, when there were 81 routes, the number has increased until in 1914 there were 43,652, for the maintenance of which the government expended $47,377,070 as against $8,840 in 1896—and there has been a notable increase in these figures in 1915. There has also been a gradual increase of salary until today the maximum salary is $1,200 per annum as against $0 at the beginning of the service. The routes, of course, greatly vary in their characteristics, some being along macadam roads, through densely populated sections requiring numerous stops and some through sparsely settled regions over rough and hilly ground.

The Post Office Department is wrestling with many problems affecting this service, one of which is that of equipping the work performed for a given salary. The service in the aggregate distributes annually over 3,000,000,000 pieces of mail, varying in weight from a fraction of an ounce to fifty pounds, and this enormous total is handled practically right at the homes of more than twenty million people in country districts. We certainly wish for the very best conditions for the army of Rural Free Delivery carriers, and especially for those women who must daily live amidst a romance they are altogether too busy to perceive. W. B. ASHBY.

The "Ninety and Nine" Reversed

THE first Protestant church ever erected in North America for a leper congregation was dedicated this last spring in Iberville Parish, about seventeen miles south of Bon Rouge, La., on the banks of the Mississippi. The tract of land upon which the buildings of this colony are situated comprises about eleven hundred acres. The actual establishment of a Protestant church in connection with this work is a triumph to the friends of this pitiable class—a forward step in a field of Christian stewardship with which the whole church may well keep in touch. There are missionary enterprises of so much greater extent absorbing our interests that the silent labors of those who look after the widely scattered, comparatively few people who make up the leper world get but infrequent notice. And it is startling to consider that even yet only one in a hundred of the world's leper population has been brought under Protestant Christian influence. The ninety and nine are still far from the Shepherd's tender care, alone, yes, indeed, alone on the mountains bleak and bare.

OF the somewhat more than a million of these unfortunate people in the world, only twelve thousand are reached by missionary influence, and of these two totals but a small percentage is found in America. But this affliction is prevalent in this country in a sufficiently serious form to warrant a greater degree of civic control over the victims so as to prevent all possibility of spread of the disease. The Christianizing influence thrown about these unfortunate is therefore of real national value. Cases of them are in the states of Mesota, New York, Massachusetts, Georgia, Louisiana and Texas, and several cases are known to be in Florida, Mississippi, Alabama and a number of other states; that is to say, enough cases to be known to the authorities. In California, for example, about thirty individuals are under surveillance.

Massachusetts an isolation hospital has been provided for them. This institution on the island of Penikese some fifteen miles off Martha's Vineyard, is a good example of what Christian love can provide. This is a fifteen-acre island, and is kept as a safe home for lepers. The buildings include experimentation houses for research work by specialists in tropical diseases and by physicians from other institutions. There are individual cottages for the patients and the entire colony basks in friendliness, comfort and good cheer. While Penikese is a state institution, the atmosphere is wholly Christian and the religious work there comes under the general supervision of the Mission to Lepers, an organization through which practically all the Christian denominations reach this class.

The Louisiana Leper Settlement has for a good many years cared for nearly as many of these people as are found in all the rest of the United States, but the Protestant church has been rather slow in taking its share of the burden. Two or three years ago, however, the Mission to Lepers succeeded in providing Protestant Christian services at the Settlement, and now at a church has been established there. The inmates of the Settlement had long desired such a church and took enthusiastic interest in the final ceremony of dedication. The frame structure will seat about one hundred and twenty persons, and is so arranged that the women are seated on one side of the room and the men on the other. Leper residents filled the church with flowers for the services, which were opened with the favorite hymn of this almost friendless class, "What a Friend We Have in Jesus." This latest advance in the church's missionary zeal for the people who are so peculiarly a connecting link, in a sense, with Bible times, marks the close of about forty years' work. It was in 1874 that Wesley C. Bailey, an Irishman, representing the American Presbyterian church as a missionary to Asia, India, began to interest American friends in the unhappy folks, and began an interdenominational work which has proven an almost unique illustration of how church union may benefit Christian service work. Today the thirty-five leading missionary societies of the world act together in affiliation with the Mission to Lepers.

In all there are ninety-two stations, sixty-two asylums, and thirty-three homes for untainted children.

Main Building, Louisiana Leper Station

An Asylum Which Began in an Old Deserted Tile Kiln

with a total of about twelve thousand individuals supported by these bodies. Families of lepers are not usually large, and many who seek admission to the asylums shrink from giving up their children. Nevertheless, most valuable work is performed in separating untainted children from their parents and bringing them up in sound health to live useful Christian lives. Of course, this is arranged in the most humane way, and parents eventually understand and appreciate what has been done.

IT is a relief to realize that work among the lepers has been robbed of much of the horror that once surrounded it. It is still and probably always will be an isolated work, and that alone entails enormous sacrifices. But science has made advances in the treatment of this disease, and Christian thought has provided much of modern comfort and cheer to offset the hopelessness which accompanies the disease. The church has become the social and religious center in the leper colony life. The inmates gather together and spend hours of time daily, just to hear each other recite Scripture and talk of such subjects. Some of these people, it is said, can quote the Scriptures for two hours at a time.

Mr. Sam Higginbottom, graduate of Princeton, a pioneer in a way in this work, was asked whether giving lepers their support pauperized them. He then tells of the way in which his lepers are allowed eight cents a week to spend in any way they choose, this little eight-cent allowance providing sweets and peppers and things dear to the Indian leper's heart. But in many cases the lepers deposited all of their weekly allowance in the contribution box. When Father Endeavorer Clarke was in India at the Agra Convention, these lepers out of their eight cents a week sent their native minister as a delegate, he not being a leper. They declined to allow the funds of the mission station to provide his expenses because, they said: "We want to pay our expenses, so that he will be our delegate."

Referring to the gardens which are such a help in keeping the colony contented, an interesting incident of a prize-winning contest is told by the superintendent of the Naini Leper Asylum, India. A small block of irrigated land was assigned to each leper who had hands and feet enough left to do gardening for his or her individual use, and a prize was offered for the one making the best showing. One of the competitors in this contest was an old woman whose fingers were all gone from both hands. With a sharp metal instrument tied to her fingerless arms, she dugged in the earth so successfully that at the close of the season she won the prize for the best piece of garden.

BUT there are still ninety and nine out of each one hundred lepers, who apparently are left to their fate, so far as the Christian church is concerned. At least, that is to be deduced from the statistics. The great majority of lepers are still the despised of their countries, and such care as is given is all too frequently from the motive of self-protection. The Mission to Lepers offers enviable opportunities of Christian service to all save those "who best can drink His cup of woe and triumph over pain; patient to bear his cross below and follow in his train." This organization which has its headquarters at Cambridge, Mass., and of which W. M. Danner is secretary, defrays the cost of the erection of buildings, the maintenance of the lepers and their children, the medical aid supplied and the pay of the native workers. The supervision is given and Christian teaching provided in each case by a denominational missionary assigned by his Board of Foreign Missions. In practically every case, the service is taken on voluntarily—taken on by heroes of the Faith. And then, from time to time, in the denominational press appear such items as these:

"Death of Sir George Turner.—On March 11 at Colyton, Devon, England, a true knight died. Devoted to medical work among lepers in South Africa, he also stamped out rinderpest among the cattle, saving millions of pounds to his country. He pursued studies in leprosy in the laboratories of England after reaching the age limit. It was his life ambition to find some remedy. Unhappily, after several years' work, he recognized certain leprosy marks on his own hand. He worked on unswervingly amid the pain and shadow of a leper's lot, till a sudden hemorrhage caused his death. From His Majesty he had received the honor of knighthood. He was 79 years old."

A recent trip of Bishop A. W. Knight to the lepers of Palo Saco, Panama Canal zone, is said to be the first visitation of an Episcopal Bishop to lepers in the history of that body, and probably afforded the only instance in the history of the Episcopal Church of the confirmation of lepers.

The War in Europe By ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing, military critic, staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps, contributor to L'Indépendance Belge

AT a meeting of Parliament during the week ending September 16, Prime Minister Asquith stated that the cost of the war to England per day had now attained the enormous figure of twenty-one million dollars, and in the immediate future this cost was expected to reach the almost incredible figure of twenty-five million dollars each day. At this latter rate the direct cost to this one belligerent alone for one calendar year would be nine billion, one hundred and twenty-five million dollars.

Expressed in another form, a daily expenditure of twenty-five million dollars means $289 every second of every day of the year. Three seconds at this rate would produce a sum a trifle greater than the income of the average American family for one year. The five-thousand-dollar-a-year man would require only 18 seconds to more than earn his salary, and the railroad president's fifty thousand dollars a year could be earned in three minutes. Twelve minutes would pay for a school building costing two hundred thousand dollars, and one hour and three minutes would defray the total expenditure for 1914 of the oldest foreign missionary society of the United States, the Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; while one day would more than pay the interest for a year on the entire interest-bearing debt of the United States.

If we add to Great Britain's expenditures those of all the other belligerents the sum total will approximate a daily outgo quite beyond our power to visualize.

The question of coal for the coming winter in France is a most pressing one,

The retail price has now reached $26 per ton, which is not anthracite but what we call soft coal, and even at this price the supply is limited. The British production of coal for the half year ending June 30 declined 8.9 per cent, as compared with the corresponding period last year, and this in the face of a greater home demand, so that France can expect little relief from that quarter. Orders have been placed in America for some 2,000,000 tons, a mere drop in the bucket.

The important political event of the week has been the understanding arrived at between Bulgaria and Turkey, which we are assured was definitely signed on Friday, September 10, and by which Bulgaria is to remain neutral.

Simultaneously with this announcement we have been officially informed that collisions between the Greek and Bulgarian frontier guards have taken place, and it is further rumored that like collisions have taken place on the Bulgarian frontier of Rumania. Rumania has called her reserves to the colors, as has Bulgaria, and there is every indication, borne out by the new from all quarters, that a crisis in Balkan affairs is at hand.

In view of the possibilities of the Balkan situation, the Central Empires have concentrated a large force, said to be from 400,000 to 500,000 men on the northern frontiers of Rumania and Serbia, and the beginning of hostilities between Bulgaria and Rumania will be the signal for an advance on their part, as well as of a movement of Turkish troops from Adrianople, to aid Bulgaria.

The Dardanelles campaign has been extraordinarily quiet and this campaign continues in the form of trench fighting of the same general character as the campaign in the west, so that a gain of a few feet by one side or the other is reckoned an event of importance. The Allies to the north of the peninsula succeeded in landing reinforcements in the face of heavy cannonading by the Turkish artillery.

An Italian landing north of the Gulf of Saros is said to have been made.

BIOLOGICAL FEATS PERFORMED BY THE PRINTER'S INK. By the inexorable method of elimination we recently removed ex-President Taft from among the living, for we spoke of Colonel Roosevelt as the only living ex-President. The London Times is said to have cleverly corrected a similar mistake made in its columns. It is impossible for the London Times to err, at least that is the reputation claimed for it. But an irate financier proved it could by calling on the editor to correct the erroneous report of his, the financier's, death which had appeared the day before. The editor was regretful but saw no possible way for the London Times to admit and correct even such an error. The financier was so insistent, however, that presently the editor had an inspiration. "You say, my dear sir, that we put you in the obituary notices yesterday, and that you are not dead?" he asked. "Exactly so!" "Very well," said the editor, "tomorrow we will put you in the birth notices." Profiting by this example of the power of printer's ink, we now reinstate Mr. Taft among the living ex-Presidents.

A HALF-BILLION WELL PLACED. In noting that the production of automobiles of all classes for the past year exceeded 700,000 cars and a valuation at wholesale of over $500,000,000, Alfred Noyes, general manager of the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce, points out that the greatest sales were in rural districts, where the automobile's time-saving virtues are appreciated in the highest degrees. "The steady and general lowering of initial cost and of upkeep have opened the doors of the sales-rooms to hundreds of thousands who have long been prepared to buy 'when the price is within reason.'"

A NEW NATIONAL HOLIDAY. December 8 will see every store and office and factory and farm and school and home deserted, and the roads and sidewalks packed with frightened men, women and little children, all waiting their turn in the doctors' offices to be examined for indications of breakdown, constitutional tendencies to this and that, and symptoms of disorders that must therefore be carefully watched by said doctors. Then again next year, and all the after years, the same anxious inquiry will be made on December 8; and on December 9 we shall know ourselves for the unfit beings we are. This, provided the National Medical Examination Day, the Children's Health Crusade and kindred movements win sufficient popular support to have such an annual examination of every one made compulsory. Physical examinations by competent family physicians have their real but limited place in public health. To the enlightened discretion of parents and not to the police powers of politicians must be left the decision in almost all individual cases. There are exceptions, and there also are ways to meet cases of neglect of health among those who are supposed to know better, but for the average American family this new holiday would be a monstrous thing not to be even thought of as possible.

POST MORTEM OF THE TEXAS STORM. In a comprehensive report on hurricanes in the West Indies, prepared by Dr. Oliver L. Fassig for the United States Weather Bureau and reviewed in the Panama Canal Record, the following chronology of the recent blustering visitor to Texas appears, prefaced by the explanation that the hurricane is the same type of storm as the typhoon and cyclone, the latter being the accepted technical term to include all "revolving" storms. The tornado is a concentrated cyclone, indigenous to the United States; the hurricane is restricted to cyclones originating and performing chiefly in the West Indies and neighboring waters of the North Atlantic. The one that reached over and made its mark on Texas is thus described (with some abbreviation of the report):

Tuesday, August 10.—First West Indian disturbance of present season has appeared near the central portion of the Windward Islands; intensity not indicated; cautionary advices issued.

Wednesday, August 11.—The disturbance now central near Island of St. Croix with increased intensity. Has west-northwest movement of 18 to 20 miles an hour, which should bring it over Haiti Thursday, probably reaching Cuba by Friday. Wind velocity of 60 miles observed.

Thursday, August 12.—Now south of Haiti, moving a little north of west.

Friday, August 13.—The storm passed northward over Jamaica Thursday night, apparently following course first outlined. This morning a whole gale "whole gale" may be a technical term, but it sounds definite) was blowing at Kingston.

Saturday, August 14.—Near extreme western Cuba. Now turned a little more to the north of west, but missing reports prevent more definite determination. Will probably enter Gulf of Mexico Saturday night. (Sunday's weather map was not included in the report.)

Monday, August 16.—Disturbance now approaching Texas-Louisiana coast. Gales reported throughout the east Gulf. Storm warnings ordered Sunday.

Tuesday, August 17.—The tropical storm has evidently passed into the interior of southeastern Texas. Reports from that section missing, but press reports indicate that the storm center passed over or near Galveston early Monday evening at over 70 miles an hour.

Wednesday, August 18.—Reports still missing, but storm center apparently passed south of Houston early Tuesday morning; highest wind velocity 80 miles an hour.

Thursday, August 19.—Storm still persists over northeastern Texas with diminished intensity. Delayed reports from Galveston show a wind velocity of 90 miles an hour during Tuesday night.

Friday, August 20.—Storm has taken a new lease of life and is now central over southern Missouri with increased intensity.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT LOCKING BEYOND THE WAR. The Boston Telegram is responsible for the statement that the Post Office Department will propose to Congress that the parcel post service be extended to foreign countries as a means for promoting trade by the mail order variety. The United States parcel-post arrangements with 68 countries with restrictions as to weight and size; these restrictions would be removed under the new plan.

A NEW YOUNG PEOPLE'S RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATION. What is described as the first Baptist general organization whose session field is literally the world is now in press of formation as a federation for missionary work of all the young women's organizations of the world, under the name of World-wide Guild for Young Women, auxiliary to the Women's American Baptist Home and Foreign Mission Society but having its own general leader.

A WALL STREET PROPHET. The following is quoted from the Wall Street Journal: "What America needs more than railroads, extension, and western irrigation, and low tariff and a bigger wheat crop, and a merchant marine and a new navy, is a revival of piety—the kind that fathers used to have—piety that could do good business to stop for daily family prayer before breakfast, right in the middle of the night, so as to get the chores done and to go to prayer-meeting; that borrowed money to pay the preacher's salary, and prayed fervently for salvation of the rich man who looked with such unbusinesslike behavior. That's what we need now to clean this country of the graft, and of greed, petty and big; of fine houses and big lands and high and grand social functions. What is this but a vain repetition of what has happened before their lights went out? Read the history of Rome in decay and you will find luxury that could lay a big dollar over our little that looks so large to us. Great wealth never made a nation substantial nor honorable. There is nothing on earth that looks good that is so dangerous for a man or a nation to handle as easy, big money. If you do resist its influence the chances are that it will get the best of you."

SELF-SHUTTING CANAL. Gaillard canal filled up by a slide from the east bank directly opposite the town of Culebra, a recent upheaval of the bottom of the Canal caused an island to appear above the surface of the water in about the middle of the channel. The engineering division regards this as the worst in the history of the Canal. At least a week will be required to dislodge the mass.

THE DEPARTURE IN NATURALIZATION PROCEEDINGS. The society called the League of Foreign-Born Citizens has won an important concession from the government by which many thousands of prospective citizens who do not leave their work to take out their papers during the day may now advance their application for citizenship by appearing at night before naturalization Bureau officials who will sit for that purpose. The first such session was in New York September 14, and Cuomo Curulli, an Italian, was the first man to take advantage of the new order of things.

THE BIBLE IN THE WAR. Hundreds of thousands of copies of the Bible, but especially the New Testament, have been placed in the hands of the front in the various zones of war in Europe and distributed in camps. The "Million Testaments" movement begun by the World Sunday School Association and several times announced in the Christian Herald has thus far procured more than 300,000 copies, which have been sent to the soldiers. Y. M. C. A. field workers in many have asked that organization to provide 100,000 copies of the New Testament for prisoners of different nationalities. By one means and another prisoners and hospital patients as well as the soldiers on duty are given copies in their native tongue. In Scotland a fund has been started with which to buy Testaments for the young.

BEGINNING TO FIND OUT HOW CAPABLE WE ARE. Much more than was commonly known, this country has been dependent upon brains of other countries for many things essential to our manufactures and our daily routine. The war's stoppage of some of these things, such as potash and certain chemicals, opened our eyes. There have been a few premature announcements of American "discoveries" of how to make such and that essential thing, accompanied by plant prophesies of our future commercial freedom. But somehow the shortage continued and it is said. It is difficult for the lay mind to understand why this should be. Certainly this country ought to be able to master the arts and sciences. And it is devoutly to be hoped that the latest discovery will really "take" and won't run. Dr. Thomas H. Norton, a government agent, New York to investigate the dyestuffs situation, announced early in September that an American had solved the dyestuffs mystery and would produce American dyes in several colors within a few weeks on a scale sufficient to justify the belief that this country is now independent of Germany for this commodity. The new discovery utilized oxidized cannel coal; five colors have been produced, a sky blue, a direct black, a benzol red, a blue black, and a direct green, all equal in every way to foreign standard products, according to authorities on the subject. Manufacturing plants already complete, and it is claimed that by the middle of November 10,000 pounds of dye will be turned out daily.

MAY COLONIZE ARMENIANS HERE. Current is given in the press to a report that Henry Morgenthau, American ambassador to Turkey, has offered to raise a million dollars to ward and to be used in bringing to this country some 100,000 Armenians who have escaped the slaughter which the ambassador is reported to have cleared, has, together with starvation, already claimed 350,000 of these people. One suggestion is that each of our Western states equip a ship to bring Armenians to settle within their borders. The whole project would require $5,000,000, and Mr. Morgenthau is said to have asked the government to appoint a committee of five men to supervise the undertaking, and that the Turkish government has accepted his proposal. It is declared that the persecutions of Armenians are but the first steps in a plan to rid Turkey of all Christians and Jews. Rev. Samuel M. Zwiler, D.D., of Arabia and Egypt, and a prominent authority on Oriental religions (who is now in the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York, on the evening of October 1st) declares that conditions preclude the possibility of any plan's being carried out. The Armenians, he says, have maintained their national integrity since 200 A.D., and would rather suffer massacre and starvation than leave their land. Dr. Zwiler has no faith that the Turks would permit an exodus. The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions states that it has abundant and undeniable evidence of a systematic, authorized and desperate effort on the part of the rulers of Turkey to wipe out the Armenians.

RAISING AND LAUNCHING SUBMARINES. As pictures reach the east from Honolulu showing the remains of the F-4 held up by pontoons (her crew of 22 men perished in her in March) other pictures start out for the West from the Atlantic seaboard showing the launching on September 14 at the Fore River Shipyard of our largest and most powerful boat of this general class, the M-1, a new type of submarine. The M-1 was christened by Miss Sarah Dean Roberts, daughter of Congressman and Mrs. Ernest Roberts of Massachusetts. This new submarine carries four torpedo tubes and a 4-inch deck gun, and has three periscopes of the telescopic kind that can be quickly withdrawn from sight. The boat is 185 feet long, and is so constructed that if a vessel attempts to ram her she will merely slide under the other's keel—excepting in some contingencies. The M-1 has a cruising radius of 2,500 miles, and with reserve supplies can do 5,000 miles.

THE ENIGMA OF THE DAY. We who are dependent upon the daily press for information, are absolutely at a loss to know what is going on in Mexico, and what is going on in Washington in respect to Mexico. Accounts of battles continue to reach us—enthusiastic reports of real negotiations for conferences between the factional leaders and representatives of the United States and the South American countries appear and disappear and reappear; announcement is made that Americans are warned out of Mexico by our State Department; mischievous bullets from Mexican rifles find fatal marks in American soldiers, and American bullets return the questionable compliment with good measure. And yet nothing results. By this time the whole country, one would suppose, must be unimpassioned through war, stagnation of industry, starvation. It is certainly a wonderfully peculiar situation, an aggravating situation, a disgusting situation.

BURBANK IS MADE TO LOOK LIKE AN AMATEUR. The news was recently circulated that A. W. Brabham, cotton planter of South Carolina, has produced cotton ranging in color from snow-white to a deep olive green, and expects to see raw cotton picked in any desired shade and color, including absolute black. Mr. Brabham has been experimenting with Egyptian staple seeds, obtaining so far (the report states) cream, tan, yellow, green, light brown, olive green and bronze cotton, raw. These astonishing products were exhibited in Savannah, and the city will be pointed out to any skeptic as proof of the claims. Variegated sheep next, chameleon silk worms after that, and the whole question of dyestuffs will be a thing to laugh over. Mr. Luther Burbank is quoted as venturing to doubt if black cotton is coming, but congratulates Mr. Brabham on his interesting story.

AN ABSENTEE LANDLORD VISITS HIS ESTATES. Colorado coal fields, which were long a battlefield between striking miners and both state and federal troops, are being inspected by John D. Rockefeller, Jr., one of the principal owners of fuel and iron properties there. Mr. Rockefeller has been violently attacked by the Federal Commission on Industrial Relations as morally responsible for the conditions that led to the disorders, and also for the continuance of the strike, with its many deplorable deaths. In thus condemning Mr. Rockefeller, the whole system of absentee landlordism was attacked. He is now on the scene of the Ludlow battle, visiting the homes of the miners, inspecting stores and schools and the conditions of employment at first hand. It was given out that miners would ask for a warrant for the arrest of Mr. Rockefeller because of the deaths which resulted from the strike, and that the heads of other fuel and iron companies will be similarly brought to trial. The United Mine Workers is mentioned as behind this alleged move.

WE DO NOT KNOW QUITE WHAT TO MAKE OF THIS. But we chronicle the news for what it is worth. It is announced in the press of September 21 that the Detroit manufacturer, Mr. Henry Ford, who has recently set aside ten million dollars to be used as an endowment for a peace propaganda on a world-wide scale, is about to submit to the Secretary of the Navy a plan for a new type of submarine, and in this connection his secretary states that Mr. Ford has received an average of 600 letters daily on the subject of the best use to make of his ten million dollars, and that "out of the mass of this correspondence, he has, of course, acquired many new thoughts concerning his propaganda and other defense matters." The italics are ours.

TO PRAY FOR PERSIA. Missionaries of the Presbyterian West Persian Mission, in view of the momentous issues of the present great war, and believing in the power of intercessory prayer in the great crises of history, invite all brethren to unite in prayer upon the following weekly cycle of topics to be used to guide but not to limit petitions.

Sunday: The sins of Christendom; Confession and prayer for forgiveness. Questioning how far our own lives and minds are controlled by the Spirit of the world.

Monday: Those in the war, as soldiers, sailors, medical and other assistants. Those who are suffering directly from the war, that peace may come speedily.

Tuesday: The Christian nations, especially those involved in the war, their rulers, Russia and Great Britain in their special relations to Turkey and Persia, and that the Church may be a great spiritual power at this time.

Wednesday: Moslem nations and peoples, that they may not be further estranged from Christ, that the inevitable political changes may bring justice, freedom and opportunity.

Thursday: The Church and Christians in Moslem lands, that they may give faithful testimony to the gospel of Christ, they may be saved from a spirit of revenge, may withstand temptation and persecutions.

Friday: The cause of Missions as affected by the war, especially in Turkey and Persia.

Saturday: Our personal needs, that we may realize the privilege and duty of intercessory prayer and have faith in its power.

AUSTRIAN AMBASSADOR TO RETURN HOME ON LEAVE OF ABSENCE. The threatened tension between Washington and Vienna has been at least postponed by a diplomatic move on the part of Dr. Constantin Dumba, the Austrian ambassador whose recall the State Department had requested.

Dr. Dumba has in turn requested a leave of absence in order that he might report in person upon the events which led to the action of our State Department. The ambassador has been assured safe conduct through the war zone, and pending developments in Vienna the whole matter rests. The American war correspondent, James F. J. Archibald, whose arrest in London led to the discovery upon his person of the letters from Dr. Dumba to the Austrian Minister of Foreign Affairs in Vienna, has returned to this country and declares that he was innocent of collusion in any unpatriotic proceeding.

PLAN HUGE WAR CREDIT. American financiers seem about to grant to the Commission which has come to this country from England and France to raise one billion dollars, a part of their request. The negotiations have proceeded with more or less secrecy and attended, it is claimed, by some personal danger to the commissioners, who have received threatening letters. Opposition to the extension of such a credit developed in many quarters, particularly on the part of citizens of German descent who are depositors and investors in the banks and trust companies invited to participate in guaranteeing the credit. This opposition is shared by many others in so far as the proposed loan would apply to the purchase of munitions of war. It was announced that John D. Rockefeller declined to have any part in the enterprise. The firm of J. P. Morgan have sounded the entire American financial world, and on September 20 the press declared that five and ten year bonds at 5 per cent to the extent of the loan will doubtless be issued by the governments of Great Britain and France to be guaranteed by the greatest syndicate of underwriters ever formed in this country, comprising both institutions and individuals, the credit thus established to be employed strictly for commercial bills. But this definition may be stretched to include war supplies excepting arms and ammunition and articles actually used in battle. The operation of this credit will consist in payment by the syndicate of all bills that are incurred in the United States by these two governments, the syndicate being protected by the bond issue, which is guaranteed by the bank deposits and investments of American firms and individuals, who must stand the loss should the bonds be defaulted.

The fate of the loan is still uncertain as the Christian Herald goes to press. It was positively announced by one New York daily on September 21 that our largest international banking firm, Kuhn, Loeb & Co., would take no part, and that other financial institutions had decided not to go in. It was also stated that if investors demanded 6 per cent, instead of the 5 per cent offered, "the commission will return empty handed rather than pay same." These statements as well as those that make the loan an assured fact, are still without confirmation from authoritative quarters.

PEACE RIDES FORTH IN A WAR CHARIOT. The Church Peace Union, founded by Andrew Carnegie last year with an initial gift of two million dollars to promote the cause of peace through church organizations, announces a campaign with co-operation of the World Alliance of the Churches for the Promotion of International Friendships, and the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, to enlist all ministers and churches in this country in an appeal to the President and Congress in the interests of international arbitration, the reduction of armaments by all nations, and an adequate national security and defense program by all nations meanwhile. The most willing supporters of the peace propaganda of these organizations must surely be put to some difficulty in endorsing such a bristling appeal. . . . The "League to Enforce Peace" has also adopted a resolution calling for efficient preparation for adequate national defense, as being in no way inconsistent with the purpose of the League, but, on the contrary, essential to its aims. Ex-President Taft is at the head of this League, and President Lowell of Harvard is chairman of the Executive Committee. At the close of the great G. A. R. encampment in Washington is to be a conference of the National Defense League, the Navy League, the National Rifle Association and affiliated organizations, and the Washington Star states that the personnel of the Publicity Committee appointed by these organizations is composed of practically the whole membership of the congressional press gallery and representatives of Washington publications.

WOMEN SEE NO IMMEDIATE PEACE. The delegation appointed to visit President Wilson from the Women's Peace Convention held at The Hague last April, representing both warring and neutral nations of Europe, recently presented their message, which is a petition to the President to bring about a conference of neutral nations in the interests of world peace. The members of the delegation say that no belligerent nation is willing to take the initiative. The Women's International Committee believes the proposed conference to be the most effective means for inaugurating peace, and is prepared to conduct a world-wide campaign to influence public sentiment if such a conference is called.

MAY FIGHT WAR WITH WAR. Conscription has become a definite issue in the British Cabinet, and David Lloyd George, Minister of Munitions, has warned the British public of the extreme gravity of the situation. The labor interests are outspoken against conscription, and powerful organizations have threatened the government with civil war if steps are taken to enforce enlistment.

The Hesitating Soul

A SERMON BY REV. DAVID J. BURRELL, D.D., LL.D.*

TEXT, John 1:1-14. "I go forth into the world, happy are ye if ye do them."

I SPEAK to the man or woman who means to accept Christ some time, but wants to know more about the Gospel before doing so.

Can this be offered as a valid reason for putting off the Great Decision? Let us see.

To begin with, there are some things that nobody knows. The germinative process of life is only one of ten thousand mysteries that laugh at the most resolute scrutiny of science. Of making many books covering the little that we know—there is no end; but if the things that we do not know were to be published, the bookshelves of the world could not contain them.

And there are many things which can never be found out. In my boyhood I once met Professor Morse, the inventor of the electric telegraph, and asked him: "What is electricity?" I supposed that he would define it; but his answer was, "I don't know; and what's more, I doubt if anybody will ever find out." Ten years ago I put the same question to Mr. Marconi, the inventor of wireless telegraphy, and with precisely the same result. If this be so with respect to the simple problems that lie within the province of the physical senses, what should we naturally expect of the mysteries that lie beyond, in the illimitable world of spiritual things?

But there are some things that we do know; which are like the axioms in mathematics; such as "two and two make four" and "a straight line is the shortest distance between two points." These are called "self-evident facts," because they require no proving. A wise man who is really intent on the quest of knowledge will take rudimentary truths for granted and, laying them down as postulates, move on to larger things.

If this is the part of wisdom in the common affairs of life, how much more in the larger problems of religion, which have to do with our eternal destiny? So it is written, "Let us leave the principles of doctrine [that is, the simple, elemental facts which are in the nature of intuitions] and go on unto perfection." (Heb. 6:1.)

It is my purpose now to point out some of these religious axioms, which are really held in common by all who live in Gospel light. Many who hesitate to accept Christ for want of further knowledge are really deceiving themselves and hiding in a mere subterfuge. They know enough to lead them to the Cross, were it not for the outstanding fact that the Cross itself is a stumbling-block in the way to spiritual and eternal life.

The Hope Set Before Us

The first axiom is God. You believe in a God, because you can't help it. Not that the existence of God is never denied. In the Corps Législatif, during the Reign of Terror in France, it was solemnly resolved, "That there is no God;" but presently, when the gutters of Paris were running red with blood, the legislators made all possible haste to rescind it. There are others who deny God by excluding him from their lives; as it is written, "The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God." But there are few avowed atheists in these days; and surely you are not among them.

If you really want evidence in these premises you can find it in any of our Theological Seminaries, where professors will surfeit you with ontological and cosmological and teleological arguments for the being of God; but the average man—even the Zulu who bows down before a fetish in the jungle—takes this as a self-evident fact.

The second axiom is Immortality. Jesus said, "How much better is a man than a sheep?" By just this much, that God breathed into his nostrils the breath of life and made him a living soul. A man is, therefore, as immortal as God is; because the life in him is a spark thrown off from the inextinguishable life of God.

Of course there are people who deny this. They will tell you that "death ends all"; but they don't believe it. The wish is father of the thought. Go with me along the Avenue until we come to a house bearing the sign "To Let." Suppose I say, "My friend, isn't it frightful that a whole family should be annihilated in that way?" You would lift your eyebrows and reply, "What do you mean? 'Exterminated'?" Oh, no; they have simply moved out." Suppose we go on to the next house where there is a crepe on the door. Let us enter and look at a face whereon death has left its pale impress. Will you tell me that the living man who has moved out of this tenement of flesh has ceased to be? Then I will answer that your logic is as fallacious and sophistical as mine was when I intimated that the family next door was exterminated. The man whose name is on this casket was alive yesterday; and the presumption is always in favor of the status quo. The tenant of the vacant house has simply moved out. If not, it devolves upon you to prove it. But immortality needs no argument. Ask yourself, "If a man die, will he live again?" and instantly there is a voice within you calling back, "I shall live and not die!"

Fighting the Good Fight

The third of the axioms is Responsibility. I am a normal being; that is, made under law. You may call it the moral law or the law of your being, as you will; in any case, we are under bonds to keep it. If this fact be questioned, listen to the voice of conscience "accusing or else excusing you." This is the monitor that enables us, as Plato said, "to discern betwixt the worse and better reason"; and you cannot get away from it.

This truth, however, is flatly denied by a certain class of sentimental reformers who ask immunity for all manner of criminals on the ground that they "couldn't help it." A drunkard is a dipsomaniac and a thief is a kleptomaniac, and, "Poor fellows, they can't help it." But the thief and the drunkard know better. The judge on the bench would find his occupation gone if moral responsibility were so easily bowed out of doors. Our courts of justice, jails and reformatories would all be superfluous were it not for the common sense which insists that those who do wrong must suffer for it.

The fourth axiom is Sin. There are only two kinds of people who deny personal sin. On the one hand, there are perfectionists in the church who profess to be living blameless lives; but their most intimate friends give them little or no credit for it. (See 1 John 1:8-10.) On the other hand, there are moralists outside the church, who insist that their lives are so far beyond criticism as to require no pardoning grace.

It is difficult to believe that either perfectionists or moralists are sincere in their claims. For we need but to inquire within to hear the self-convicting voice. "The Lord looked down from heaven to see if there was any that wrought righteousness; and behold, there is none that doeth good, no, not one." And if there were, neither you nor I, certainly, would claim to be that one.

The fifth axiom is Salvation. This is affirmed as a self-evident fact, because we know that if there is a God anywhere in the universe—that is, a God with a heart—he could not see his children go wrong without making bare his arm to deliver them from the power and penalty of sin.

One of the significant names of Christ is "the Arm of the Lord made bare." God so loved the world that he gave his only-begotten Son to suffer and die in our behalf. This you learned at your mother's knee; and—twist your intellectuals as you will—you cannot escape it. Nor do you really want to.

The men and women to whom I speak believe in Christ at least as an historic fact. They have an intellectual apprehension of him as the Saviour, and—more than that—as the only Saviour. They need not be reminded that in all the false religions and philosophies of the world there cannot be found a single hint or suggestion of any remedy for the universal, malignant, fatal malady of sin. They need no argument to show that the Gospel proposes to remove the handicap of life by blotting out the record of the mislived past; and that no other plan has ever been suggested for doing so. They stand beside Peter, who, when Christ asked, "Will ye also go away?" replied, "Lord, to whom can we go but unto thee? Thou hast the words of eternal life." And yet—strange to say—they hesitate to accept him!

Blind Eyes, Deaf Ears

The sixth axiom is Justification by Faith, which is expressed in the terms: "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; and he that believeth not, the wrath of God abideth on him." This is denied by the Universalists. If any man be a "Universalist" I more. I believe in Universal Salvation just as I believe in Universal Suffrage. Every man in America has a right to the elective franchise, if he choose to accept it. But you can live next door to the polls all your life, and if you don't cast the ballot you are no better for it. If you are an immigrant the franchise is yours for nothing; but on certain conditions you do not take out your naturalization papers; you will never be a citizen of the United States.

The same holds true of Universal Salvation. It is written that "Christ tasted death for every man." This makes all men salvable; so that whosoever will may take of the water of life freely. But he must take it. God can make salvation free, but he cannot give it upon us. Ours is the inevitable and inalienable power of choice. The air is free, but we must breathe it. Sunlight is free, but we can shut our eyes against it. Water is free, but a man may stand, like Tantalus, in water up to his lips and die of thirst unless he drink it. The grace of God which bringeth salvation is free, in like manner; but there is one condition fixed to its benefits, in the necessity of the case; namely, that we shall accept it. Faith is simply the appropriating hand stretched out.

But just here is where many a man falls down. The Lord offers all the riches of eternal life for the taking and men refuse to take it. Thus life goes by caught. The prodigal in the far country knew all the while that his father's house was open to receive him; but he would have lived and died in that far country, wasting his substance and feeding swine, had he not come to himself in a fortunate moment and said, "I will arise and go!"

Today, If Ye Will Hear His Voice

There is a seventh axiom which must not be omitted, namely, "Procrastination is the thief of time." You mean to accept Christ some day. You won't not for a moment admit that you intend to live and die without him.

In a ministry of over forty years I have been summoned to many sick-chambers; and I have never seen a Christian pass on to the Great Beyond without a profound joy in the Gospel and a heart full of the peace that passeth all understanding; nor have I ever seen a non-Christian die without grievous regret over the neglect of his many opportunities of accepting Christ. We all mean well; but we postpone and again and again postpone the settlement of the most important question that ever confronts us.

"Tomorrow, and tomorrow, and tomorrow;
Creeps in this petty pace from day to day
To the last syllable of recorded time;
And all our yesterdays have lighted fools
The way to dusty death."

If you were going to take a train and, hearing the conductor call, "All aboard!" should stand on the platform reluctant and hesitating, you would be late and have none to blame but yourself for it. Just there is where you are standing now.

Let me lay down this proposition: Not to decide is to decide not. How does that strike you? Not to decide for Christ is to decide against him. Do you still hesitate? It is a true proverb, "Time By-and-by leads to the house Never." That which is right to be done, cannot rightly be put off.

In each man's life there comes a time supreme,
One day, one night, one morning or one noon,
One freighted hour, one moment opportune,
One rift through which sublime fulfillments gleam,
One space when fate goes tiding with the stream,
One Once, in balance 'twixt Too Late, Too Soon,
And ready for the passing instant's boon
To tip in favor the uncertain beam.
Ah, happy he who, knowing how to wait,
Knows also how to watch, and work and stand
On life's broad deck alert, and at the prow
To seize the passing moment, big with fate,
From Opportunity's extended hand,
When the great clock of destiny strikes No

A soldier on sentry duty picked up a sap on a paper on which was printed the familiar motto, "We're traveling home to heaven above; we're going." Will you go? He had long been thinking, hoping, hesitating, and now resolved to make an end of it. Under the hymn he wrote, "By the grace of God, I'll go." John Waugh, Company Y, U. S. Volunteers, June 26, 1863. And at the next meeting in the chaplain's tent he announced his acceptance of Christ. Does any one imagine for a moment that he ever regretted it?

The man who keeps busy helping the man below him won't have time to envy the man above him—there may not be anybody above him, anyway.

Daily Meditation

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR

The Contagion of Health

SUNDAY, October 3. Philippians 1:14. "Waxing confident by my bonds." I had rather assumed that Paul's bonds would have filled his companions with fear. I thought that his imprisonment would have been a menace which would have stricken their souls with terror. But the prisoner eclipsed his prison. His courage was more obtrusive than his chains. His fellowship with the Lord was more manifest than his bondage to Roman soldier. His light shone in the darkness, at the darkness was unable to quench it. And "any of the brethren of the Lord," coming into this bright, inspiring atmosphere, felt the quickening of the apostle's triumph, and were "much more bold to speak the word without fear." The time of another man's constraint was the season of their enlargement. There is a contagion of health. Our ordinary thought and speech have made us more familiar with the contagion of disease. We are busy thinking of hostile microbes and bacteria, and the havoc which they work upon "the earthly house of this tabernacle." And we think of the unfriendly bacteria which assail the soul—evil suggestion, irreverent unworthy fear, frivolity. But there is a healthy contagion, soul influencing soul with strengthening and inspiring ministries. Every noble virtue is the heart of a splendid contagion. Paul's courage invigorates the apostolic fellowship.

Think of the contagion of serenity. How magnificent in the initial stages of panic is the calming influence of one strong man! How quieting is the subjugation of one strong woman, in the day when calamity has riven the family circle! Or think of the contagion of hope. How all our smoldering lamps borrow fresh supplies of oil from the vessel of the thoughtful optimist!

And the vital contagion can be born in obscure ministers. The sacrificial patience of Onesiphorus inspired the apostle Paul. And I wonder how much of his inveterate youthfulness the apostle owed to the presence of youthful Timothy, his own son in the faith. Every soul can be the center of contagious health. Every one in Christ Jesus can help to create the spirit and atmosphere of the city of our God.

"Life for a Look!"

MONDAY, October 4. Isaiah 45:14-25. "Look unto me and be saved, all the ends of the earth." In one of his earliest sermons, the late Mr. Spurgeon began by saying: "Six years ago today, as near as possible to this hour of the day, I was in the 'gall of bitterness and in the bonds of iniquity,' and had been long to feel the bitterness of the bondage, and to cry out in reason of the soreness of its slavery. Seeking relief and finding none, I stepped within the house of God and sat there, afraid to look upward, lest I should be utterly cut off. The minister rose in his pulpit, and read this text as I have done this morning. I looked at that moment, and the grace of faith was vouchsafed to me in the self-same instant."

God would have us turn our eyes from ourselves, from the opinions and creeds of others, from our own words and feelings, from our temptations and sorrows. We are to look off unto him as revealed to us the Son of his love. "They looked unto him and were lightened." What an inspiration it is to do life-work in a house of which the windows command a far-reaching view of the mountains or the sea! Whatever one may be doing seems to be lifted out of the commonplace or ordinary by the transporting view of the glory of the sky and sea. Life becomes ennobled and transfigured also when the individual surveys the landscape of the future lying in a golden haze of happiness. But still greater is the effect on life, when the unshuttered windows of the heart are always open towards the Lord Jesus, so that, at any moment, we can look to him and be saved. In each temptation, difficulty, entanglement, look.

The Patience of Christ

TUESDAY, October 5. Revelation 3:10. "Because thou didst keep the word of my patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of trial, that hour which is to come upon the whole world to try them that dwell upon the earth." It has been said of Lord Kitchener that he was the man who could wait. For fourteen long, weary years he worked and waited in the Sudan. His patience wore out his enemies.

We hear a great deal of service and active Christian virtues in these days, and we sometimes forget that the Bible puts this power of patience as among the very first essentials of success in the conquest of spiritual over material forces. Christ's great temptation was doubtless the trial of patience with a world that was not ready for him. His patience with his enemies allowed him to gain the victory over them in the only way he could have truly succeeded—by his moral, spiritual superiority.

What made Christ patient? It was his vision of possibility in man. He saw the disciples of the Acts in those dull and often faithless disciples of the Gospels. Patience is the result of love, and love suffereth long and is kind; love "beareth all things, believeth all things, endureth all things." Christ's patience sees in the poor prodigal the future son in the father's house. It beholds the germ of new motive in the sinful woman, and it stays his condemning hand. Faith is the handmaid of patience, for it gives us hope by its farther sight into the future. Jesus believed in humanity, therefore he was willing to wait in the midst of their faltering attempts.

Uncharity is one of the Christian's greatest foes, and uncharity is a failure in patience. It is the inability to see the possibility of goodness and truth beyond the manifest evil. It is the lack of the power to wait for all the facts. It is the sad break-down of our love. When I am tempted to hastily accuse, let me remember this great text: "Because thou didst keep the word of my patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of trial."

The Daily Cleansing

WEDNESDAY, October 6. John 13:12-30. "I, when, your Lord and Master, have washed your feet." We have been washed—once, definitely and graciously we have been bathed in the cleansing floods which flow from Calvary; but we need a daily cleansing. Our feet become soiled with the dust of life's highways; our hands grimy, as our linen in the grime of a great city; our lips—as the whitened doorstep of a house—are fouled by the incessant throng of idle, unseemly and fretful words; our hearts cannot keep unsoiled those stainless robes with which we leave our prayer-closet at morning prime. Constantly we need to repair to the Laver where the priests were accustomed to wash, while engaged in the services of the temple. We have received the blessing of the great altar of Calvary, but we need to receive continuously the blessing of the Laver, which stood between the altar and the entrance of the Holy Place.

Each act of confession on our part involves a repetition of the scenes of this chapter on the part of Christ. Whatever important work he may have on hand; whatever directions he may be giving to the loftiest angels for the fulfillment of his purposes; however pressing the concerns of the Church or the Universe on his broad shoulders—he must needs turn from all these to do a work for us which he cannot delegate to others. Again he stoops from his throne, girds himself with the towel of humility, and in all lowliness endeavors to remove from us the stain which his love cannot pass over. He can never pass an hour without stooping to do the most menial work of cleansing filthy souls. And it is because of this that he sits on the Throne and wields a sovereignty over hearts and worlds.

Lightening Our Neighbor's Load

THURSDAY, October 7. Galatians 6:2. "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ." It is sometimes thought that there is no truer secret of business success than in following the old proverb, "Honesty is the best policy." The Bible teaches again and again that it is for a person's own interest to be unselfish, that the burden of our own sorrows and cares can be lifted in no way so easily as by endeavoring to carry or to make lighter another's load. Christianity, like honesty, is an impersonal thing; it thrives best when we consider others as well as ourselves.

It is usual for us to say that we have troubles enough of our own without trying to share those of our neighbors. Some people are always desirous of telling us of their wrongs and crosses. They have not discovered the first secret of the shifting and the loss of care by the divine art of participation with some other soul in his difficulties.

This simple recipe for happiness is, according to Paul, "the law of Christ." The peace of Christ came in the midst of the cross; without the cross, which represented the burdens of the world, there might have come to our Master power, but there could not have come peace. The world can give a certain amount of happiness; but blessedness, as he knew it, came from a deeper inward source—the spirit of sacrifice, the utter surrender of his individual will to the will of God.

If you have sorrow, go out and take a part of another's sorrow and you will forget much of your own. If you have fear for any reason whatsoever, go out and lighten the load of your neighbor's fear, and new faith will come.

The Faith That Dares to Lay Hold

FRIDAY, October 8. II Thessalonians 3:1-18. "The Lord direct your hearts into the love of God, and into the patience of Christ." The old version puts it thus: "Into the patient waiting for Christ," but the Revised Version is obviously true to the original. The word direct is used in the first Epistle, in which Paul hopes that God will direct his way to Thessalonica. Evidently, as that city was his goal, so the love of God and Christ's patience are our goal, not to be gained at once, but after many a day of quiet plodding along the path marked out for us. You do not at once leap into all the love of God; or at once take up and retain the patient attitude which our Lord manifests through the ages. You are led into it step by step.

The quickest way to enter into the love of God is to affirm it and show it. There is nothing nobler than to stand amid the mysteries of the universe and of life and say, "I believe, though I cannot understand or explain it, that God is love." Dare to believe in the reign of love. It is over all, and in all, and through all. Open your heart to the love of God and patience of Christ, in every moment that your stock of love or of patience runs low. Draw on your infinite supplies. Claim them! Appropriate them! Reckon that you have received them. Act in that faith, and as you act, you discover that your faith has been answered, and that what you sought for has been given. That is a beautiful story which James Guthrie's servant told him of Samuel Rutherford, when he was staying as a guest for a night in their home. It appears one morning that the door of his room was open and he saw him walking slowly backwards and forwards saying: "Lord, make me to believe in thee." Then a pause, and he said: "Lord, make me to love thee." Then another pause, and finally "Lord, make me to keep thy commandments." These are steps on the path of which Paul speaks.

The Kingdom in the Heart

SATURDAY, October 9. Luke 17:21. "The Kingdom of God is within you." The kingdom is righteousness, peace and joy. Not peace first, but righteousness; then peace. Christ's kingdom comes before morality. First, pure in heart, right in spirit, gentle in mind. Then follows forgiving enemies, being peacemakers, made perfect in love; a heart that is more than a photograph of Christ; it is Christ himself within.

Four men were cast upon an island. All they had was a Bible. They could only pray, read and worship, like Jacob at Bethel. They had no church, no ritual, no priest, but they worshipped in spirit and in truth, and the kingdom of heaven was within them. External are secondary things; heart things are first. The inner life is the holy of holies, where the heart throbs with love for God and fellow men. If we get the heart right first, the head will come in on a later train. If we are planted like trees of righteousness in the soil of love, the fruits of love, joy and peace will bless him that gives and him that takes.

Is this empire of Christ's kingdom set up in your soul? Then you will be crowned with him on the throne of his glory.

"It Has Never Been Tried"

IT IS related of a distinguished clergyman that, being asked if Christianity could redeem the world, he replied, "It has never been tried."

The answer was absolutely true. There has never been a time, since Jesus walked on earth proclaiming his Gospel to men, when that Gospel has been set up and faithfully followed as a standard of conduct by the nations, or by a group of them, or even by a single nation.

God loves to be helped. Not that the Omnipotent needs the puny help of man; but he has reposed in man the power to distinguish, and the duty to choose, the good from the evil. It is due to man's failure, therefore—not to God—that the world has chosen the evil rather than the good, and that war and other sins innumerable have free sway. God's way, which he has revealed to us in the glorious Gospel of his Son Jesus, has never been tried.

Nations, communities, are called Christians by courtesy. Statisticians tell us there are in the world today 564,510,000 men and women who are classed as Christians, being about one-third of the earth's total population. This third includes all the churches in what is known as Christendom. It includes, with a single exception, all the powers in Europe. It includes practically all of this continent. If these five hundred millions, with all of their tremendous power, influence and wealth, were suddenly to decide that, beginning today, they would be faithful to the Gospel and follow its leadings and apply its principles in all the affairs of life, then the spiritual revolution would begin in earnest.

But the old minister was right. On anything like a national or international scale, the reforming, redemptive, regenerative power of Christianity has "never been tried."

The War Nearing Palestine?

NOT since the age of the Crusades has Palestine presented such an aspect as it does today, unless recent cable dispatches on the subject are greatly exaggerated. As the theater of war expands in the near East, the Holy Land, so the cable tells us, is being transformed into an armed camp. Fields, gardens and vineyards are becoming the drill-grounds of soldiers. On the slopes of Mount Olivet troops are maneuvering daily, and the convents erected on the English, French and Russian concessions are being used as barracks for the Turkish soldiery. All the sacred historic hills that girdle the Holy City are scenes of martial activity. The reverent quiet of Gethsemane and the Kedron Valley is rudely broken. Even Golgotha, the scene of our Lord's crucifixion—the little hill overlooking the Grotto of Jeremiah—is trodden under foot by marching infantry, and the ancient road which curves like a white ribbon between Jerusalem and Jericho, along which Jesus walked, has been made a highway for armored motor cars and artillery. Nazareth, where he passed the days of his youth, is being girdled with trenches. Tiberias on Lake Galilee is also being prepared for defense, and some of the ancient buildings have been leveled to the ground to afford a clear field for artillery. These preparations on so extensive a scale indicate that an invasion is expected.

In the past, Jerusalem has suffered in many great wars. It has been rebuilt again and again, and the present city stands above the ruins left by half a score sieges. Its defenses are not calculated to withstand modern weapons, and should invasion actually take place, little may be left to identify the landmarks that have been so dear to the Christian pilgrims of modern days. The eyes of the whole world will be fixed upon it, if in the near future the battle-tide should set in that direction. But, even should the worst come, Jerusalem will rise again. It will yet be "the joy of the whole earth," with all its ancient glories restored. The time has indeed come when we are reminded of the words: "Pray for the peace of Jerusalem; they shall prosper that love thee."

"I Will Sing of Thy Power"

MUSIC and force hardly seem to belong together. Power suggests noise but not music. Yet the Psalmist declared that the thought of God's might made him feel like singing. "I will sing of thy power," he said.

It makes a vast difference what our personal relation to power may be. Sitting comfortably in an express train we feel that all the strength of steam and steel is friendly and helpful; but if we are outside the train, crossing the track, all that power becomes hostile, threatening, dreadful. We must fly from it or be destroyed. The gull or petrel is not afraid of the power of the sea, but toys with angry waves that could sink a ship. In the presence of power they sing.

The thought of God is full of mystery; for the sinner full of terror. Instinctively we know that conscience means God, and the terrors of our soul tell us that God is terribly strong.

But we need not fear that power. The whole message of the Bible, especially of the New Testament, is that all God's power is friendly toward the soul that wishes to do right. Power that made us tremble when we were bent on wrong-doing makes us rejoice when we have set our feet on the paths of righteousness. All the forces of God are helping us as we link our life with his.

Then we know, despite the strange woes of earth, "that all things work together for good to them that love God." Then we experience the fulfilling of the promise as we strive against sin: "I will put my Spirit within you, and cause you to walk in my statutes." Then we go from strength to strength, jubilantly remembering that "he that spared not his own Son but delivered him up for us all" will also with him "freely give us all things." Then, when a task awaits the doing which will honor him and help those for whose welfare he is yearning we can confidently exclaim: "I can do all things through Christ, who strengtheneth me."

Under His Banner

AS a reward for deeds of valor, for exemplary achievement, for signal service, the field-marshal, the general, and the every-day soldier receives from his royal master and chief evidences of favor and recognition. The populace rises up and by demonstration hails the hero and lionizes him. A new title, a declaration, a printed eulogy, are the tangible results of such favor.

How small and passingly insignificant as compared to the rewards of the soldier of the cross! Our fights and campaigns as followers behind that standard—whose Bearer has the distinction of having both shown the way and trod it—though hard and ever full of pitfalls and delays, have the happy assurance possessed by no other campaign of a successful and satisfactory ending. There is no uncertainty about our goal, nor of our reaching it—no contingency of chance or of the thousand and one things that stand in the way and which may possibly nullify the most careful calculations and expectations of earthly campaigns. Our goal is sure and fixed, our reaching it beyond a doubt, if we but get in line and follow the Commander.

There are in our battles, as in all battles, ups and downs, advances and retreats, defeats and victories. There is fatigue and hurt, there are wounds and there is even death. But who would want it otherwise? This life of ours, as soldiers of the Cross, what would it be but for its ups and downs? Who but he who has been down, depressed, burdened under a load seemingly too heavy, staggered under a sense of his own unworthiness to carry the armor of life, can fully appreciate the cheering "Come unto me, all ye that labor"? Who but he who has "hungered and thirsted" can satisfactorily go to Jacob's well to never thirst again? Who but he who has lost his all may fully revel in the certainty that this world's tribulations are not worthy of the glory to come?

While marching in his ranks here below, he gives us the "peace that the world cannot give," "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ," wisdom, a faith that moves mountains, the righteousness of him that hath fulfilled all demands, strength and power, and a new heart, cleansed from all evil desires. And for our mere temporal needs we have from him life, food and raiment, rain and fruitful seasons and all good things.

But we would be a soldier of the cross for another and higher reason. To every soldier finally comes the end of the campaign, and so it will come to us. But, unlike the men in the earthly trenches, with us it does not end all, but is but the beginning of our reward. Our soldiering here below, our forced marches, our fights, our campaigns in torrid heat and icy blasts, our ups and downs, our hurts, pains, defeats and triumphs, all end in that greatest of all rewards, hearing the glad greeting: "Come, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." Yes, the crown of life, and the morning star, the white stone. What is the Iron, the Victoria Cross, what a field marshal's baton, what a general's star, what the applause of a demonstrative populace, what the salvos of the multitudes, compared with the inheritance of a kingdom prepared since the foundation of the world, where with the company of the saints and in fellowship with the great Commander himself we shall reign with him? With that reward in view the ups and downs, the advance and retreats, the defeats and victories, the fatigues, the hurts and wounds, yes, even death itself, are surely well worth while.

Thought Industry

AN EXPONENT of the new psychology was recently reported to have said that "only one out of twenty-five thousand persons can think." Helen Keller is said to have made the sweeping statement that Americans do not think. President Hibben of Princeton University, addressing a gathering of private school masters the other day, said: "If I were asked to name the greatest defect of the present undergraduate, I would say it was his tendency to postpone until tomorrow the task of today. Colleges connive in this by making his work too agreeable; the teacher at once helps him over any difficulty. Men in the world must earn their daily bread by the sweat of their brows, but the student can acquire knowledge quite vicariously, without having to exert himself for it. He should be made to think his way out of difficulties for himself."

The mind is the most delicate piece of mechanism in the world. It can be made to do great things or spoiled by misuse, or neglect, or overuse, so it cannot do anything. There is widespread and intense dissatisfaction with our present system of education, and earnest efforts are being made to find better methods. Plans such as those used at the University of Wisconsin and at Gary, now also being attempted in New York, promise to disclose a better path. In the midst of all this uncertainty is the fact that any thousands are deprived of the opportunity of developing and training their minds by the cruel pressure of poverty and overwork. We read of underfed school children, so poorly nourished that their brains cannot perform the required school work. We see the children thrust out from the schoolroom to earn their living and to help the family livelihood by working in noisome perilous factories. We see men and women crushed and burdened, with no time to think or read.

Will-power, sacrifice, saving of time, a little practice in observing, a little exercise in meditation, a wise use of our opportunities for reading, the cultivation of a real appetite for truth, a little training in patience and humility and real teachableness, a little better submission to the drudgery of research, with ever increasing willingness to surrender prejudice for fact, an earnest purpose to make something of ourselves that we may be useful to others—and we can help America relieve herself from the stigma of being composed of people who do not and cannot think.

Vacation Benefits

SUMMER is ended, schools have reopened and all the varied activities that were temporarily halted during vacation have been resumed. To a very large number of Americans the past summer has brought a new and enjoyable experience. Owing to the uncertainties incident to ocean travel this year, they have spent their vacation season profitably and pleasurably, in getting better acquainted with the scenic beauties, the historic places and the alluring natural wonders of their own land. Mountain and seashore have opened up unexpected charms, and what they have lost in not "seeing Europe," they have more than gained in "seeing America."

Travel, either at home or abroad, is a great mind-broadener. Goldsmith, in his "Citizen of the World," showed that he felt this influence, when he returned to Europe—possibly in a more limited though free and more enjoyable sense than the modern traveler—with "two shirts, six shillings and a flute!" Travel enlarges the mental horizon, quickens the sense of human brotherhood, and plucks up by the roots many prejudices and false impressions of our distant neighbors, making us realize that differences in race, language and surroundings are less material than we had imagined, and that the great Father "hath made of one blood all nations." In this country of ours, which has been aptly described as the "melting pot" of the world, the races meet and mingle and coalesce, and all are ultimately inspired with the spirit of American democracy. It is an exhilarating thought, which must have come to many a home vacationist this year, that we are steadily, silently, ceaselessly building up in the hearts and lives of those who come here from over sea a love of liberty and of the kind of their adoption which makes them kindred with ourselves.

The Jewish New Year

ON September 9 the Jews everywhere celebrated Rosh-hashonah or the New Year for the fourteen million Jews in the world. To the Hebrew this is the holiest day in the year. The ninth and tenth of September were employed in special services in behalf of the Jewish sufferers of the war. It is estimated that all the Jews of the world with the exception of the 3,500,000 in America arriving in the war zone of Europe. There are 350,000 Jews fighting for the Czar, 250,000 of them under the tricolor of France, 170,000 in the Austrian army, 50,000 of them fighting for the Kaiser, and 20,000 under the British flag. The head of the British Hospital fund committee was Lord Rothschild, a Jew. The head of the British Finance Commission, who lately visited New York concerning a war loan, is Baron Rotschild, the Lord Chief Justice of England, born Isaacs, a Jew. The Kaiser put the management of the entire railway system of Germany and Austria under the supreme control of Herr Bal, creator of the great German merchant marine, a Hebrew. General Heymann, in charge of a French arm corps, and the grand officer of the Legion of Honor, is a Jew. In Turkey, the supreme military commander Enver, who has just been decorated by the Kaiser for distinguished service in the Dardanelles, is a Jew. Baron Sotog, who is a Hebrew, is the Foreign Minister in Italy. In the United States and in New York City especially, the Jews have secured a singularly dominant influence in so many departments of human endeavor. On New Year the Jews held their service of humiliation, prayer and benefaction for the members of their race, such heavy sufferers by the war. One or two of the rabbis of New York indulged in a bitter chat that "Christianity is a failure," which was as ungracious and unjust in spirit as it was untrue in its conclusion. The condemnation of war, and the passionate prayer to God for peace by the Jews on "New Year" was heard. Gentiles as well as Jews devoutly join in the prayer that this prophecy of the old Hebrew prophet might be fulfilled: "They shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." (Isa. 2:4.)

Concerning Mosquitoes

THE same methods used in exterminating the disease-bearing mosquito in the Panama Canal Zone may be employed successfully in New York or any other city," said Surgeon General William L. Gorgas of the United States army. He was in charge of sanitation during the construction of the Canal. This was his advice: "Abolish roof gutters, drain off all stagnant water, do not allow empty cans and barrels to sit around, keep fever patients covered so mosquitoes cannot bite them and spread disease to others." He said that of the several hundred varieties of the insect only two were considered disease-bearing. They were theopheles which spreads malaria, and the culex, which conveys yellow fever. General Gorgas said: "When we undertook to clean up Panama we began by draining all puddles and clearing off all brush within two hundred feet of a residence. These kinds of mosquitoes can only fly two hundred feet. A house that far away from the stagnant water is likely to be safe against the pest. If brush is left, however, the mosquito can get a rest after his two hundred feet of flight and get to the house. Mosquitoes come from eggs which are always laid in water. About one hundred eggs are laid at a time, and they hatch within two or three days, growing into larvae which remain in the water about ten days. This is the best time for their destruction." In Cuba and Porto Rico the Surgeon General traced the yellow fever carriers to the roof gutters and cans about the premises. He says the New Jersey mosquito does not carry a deadly disease. It is good medical science to but refused all compensation for his services, while expending his wealth freely in feeding and clothing the American armies. Never were romance and chivalry, allied with personal worth of the highest character, more conspicuously displayed than by the young French marquis in his service for our country. After the War of the Revolution, La Fayette went back to France and entered actively into his nation's public affairs. He made several visits to our land, one of which was a historic ovation. In 1824 Congress invited

Great Falls Power Plant Is Proposed

IT is proposed to build a new $15,000,000 power plant at Great Falls, Va. This will be the first government-owned power plant in the country. The plan is to construct a high dam in the Potomac River, nearly on the north-west boundary of the District of Columbia, to generate power for use in the Government departments, both Federal and municipal, and probably, eventually, for general use. It is also planned to increase the present water supply of the district by pumping to Dalecarlia Reservoir from the pool and enhance the capacity of delivery of water to the Dalecarlia Reservoir and the filtration plant at the McMillan Park Reservoir. The estimated cost is $15,000,000 for increase in water supply and $8,849,000 for power development, a total of $23,849,000. It has been recommended that an initial appropriation be made of $3,000,000 for beginning the work. Talk of utilizing the tremendous water energy of Great Falls for supplying power to Washington has been going on almost since the Revolution. The remains of an old mill constructed by George Washington are still visible on the site. Modern invention is creating no new elements or powers in nature, but is only discovering those that have existed from the beginning of things. The steam was ready for the engine from Cape to Cairo thousands of years ago, if the people could have only found it. The electric current was waiting to illuminate the hanging gardens of Babylon in the dim past, if some one could have seen it and made use of it. The government will hitch up to man's practical use the mighty power of the Great Falls that has been comparatively idle through the long centuries. Our spiritual power consists in so adjusting ourselves to God by faith in Christ that his energy, life and love may be turned in on the wheels of our faculties and activities. The tremendous power thus secured is thus declared: "I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me." (Phil. 4:13.)

cure disease, but better to prevent it. As the hand of Providence is seen in the work of advanced medical science in preventing pestilence by the destruction of the insect so busy in carrying the deadly virus, these words occur to mind: "Surely he shall deliver thee from the snare of the fowler, and from the noisome pestilence." (Ps. 91:3.)

La Fayette's Birthday

THE first Monday in September, observed as Labor Day, was celebrated in many places in America as La Fayette's birthday, being the 158th. La Fayette was born at Chavagnac (Auvergne), September 6, 1757. Descendant of one of the proudest families of the nobility of France he left home, friends, country and prospects for distinction, and came as a youth of nineteen to take part in America's struggle for freedom. He greatly admired Washington, became his intimate friend, and fought with him till the glorious end at Yorktown. He accepted the title of Major General in the American army, him to visit this country officially and voted him a gift of $200,000 and a whole township besides. "La Fayette Day" was celebrated at the Panama Exposition at San Francisco, and the hero of two continents was befittingly remembered. We were fortunate in the singularly good and great men who founded our nation. God in his good providence selected and directed them. Of La Fayette can be said that which was spoken of another: "For he loveth our nation." (Luke 7:9.)

Swimming in School Curriculum

THE toll of drowning in the ocean, lake and river this year, as in others, has been so terrible as to cause widespread sorrow, and should compel some relief from these untimely deaths. We take the microbes out of the milk for the babies, inject virus into the arm for smallpox, diphtheria, typhoid and the like; we insist on sanitation to keep out the white plague and other diseases, and yet let our boys and girls, men and women, drown by hundreds and by thousands and make no serious effort to stop the needless massacre. The remedy is simple and at hand. Let every child be taught to swim. Let swimming be a compulsory part of the public school curriculum. Sweden compels every school boy and girl to learn to swim as a part of the school course. Swimming teachers and pools should be provided in our schools this coming season, and no delay allowed in this long needed reform. The prophet thus refers to this useful accomplishment: "And he shall spread forth his hands in the midst of them, as he that swimmeth spreadeth forth his hands to swim." (Isa. 48:11.)

Called to Prayer

A CALL to prayer addressed to every individual in the country and carrying the words, "Pray without ceasing," was sent out the other day by the Laymen's Missionary Movement of the United States and Canada in preparation for a series of conventions, the first of which will be held in Chicago, October 14-17. The movement is designed to be of a nation-wide character for the spread of the Gospel. Seventy-five of these conventions will be held in the various cities, culminating in a National Missionary Congress in Washington, April 26-30, 1916. These laymen are beginning right. The Divine presence, guidance and saving power, secured alone by earnest united prayer, is absolutely necessary to the success of all evangelical effort. It is to be hoped that this general call to prayer will be heeded, and that the truth of these words of Christ may be verified: "Ask and it shall be given you, seek and ye shall find, knock and it shall be opened unto you." (Matt. 7:7.)

Youth Racing Drops Dead

DEATH was the winner of a 100-yard race a few days ago at the picnic of La Lega Eclia, an Italian society, in Ulmer Park, Brooklyn, N. Y. Thousands, thrilled by the close contest, urged on their respective favorites. In the last yards, Gustave Magevoia, twenty years old, sprinted ahead. The cheers of his friends as he grasped the finish tape ceased suddenly when they saw him throw up his arms and fall dead. There should be the most careful medical examination of athletes before entering the contests into which must be thrown the last drop of strength possessed. So many racing for wealth or fame or earthly success drop out of life suddenly, just as they have won the prize, and have done so as a penalty for their speed in the race. The sudden exit of the young man should recall this injunction: "Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of Man cometh." (Matt. 24:44.)

Plowing Stone Streets

AN eleven-ton plow has been invented that will turn up the most compactly paved street of a city as easily as a farmer's plow will turn a soft dirt furrow. At a test the other day it ripped up 1,475 feet of Medina stone blocks in three minutes. The inventor of the machine is Charles H. Clark, an engineer of the Cleveland Railway Company. He claims that the engine plow will take the place of a gang of men and do the work in a small fraction of the time required to do it by hand. Man's imitation of Omnipotence in the practical employment of the mighty forces of nature is in keeping with his appointment to authority over the earth. "Be fruitful and replenish the earth and subdue it." (Gen. 1:28.)

The Trials of Censorship in a Free Country

Written for The Christian Herald by SIR FREDERICK E. SMITH

AT THE outbreak of the war, Sir F. E. Smith was made Director of the British Official Press Bureau. After organizing this and remaining at the head of it for about two months, he went to France as an intelligence officer on the staff of Lieutenant-General Sir James Wilcocks, commanding the Indian Army Corps. For eight months he remained there in active service, then to return to England to become Solicitor-General in the coalition government. He has recently argued American contraband cases in the prize court on behalf of the English Government.—The Editor.

I HAVE been invited to write a short article dealing with English censorship, as its activity affects or has affected the American public. I am very glad to accept this invitation, although my own personal control of the censorship in England ended when I left for France toward the end of September last year. I was, however, the director and organizer of the Official Press; and, as I was responsible for that institution at the period when most of its mistakes were committed, it is perhaps not inconvenient that I should make some observations in partial explanation to those who suffered by them.

It must be remembered that we in England had never before been engaged in a war in which censorship was of very great importance. We had never even conceived of a system under which our press, which has enjoyed a freedom equal to that of your own, would immediately find itself in the clutches of a cast-iron discipline, while at the same time the gigantic number of cables which daily leave these shores would suddenly require detailed examination.

Yet both these things became necessary, and they became necessary the moment war commenced. The necessity needs no argument in relation to the press. That nation is the strongest under the conditions of modern warfare which gives its enemy the least possible information as to its own domestic concerns which may be useful to him. Our press is certainly controlled today as it has never been controlled before, but, even now, that it is not sufficiently controlled is suggested, among other considerations, by the fact that our enemies show an extraordinary desire to receive every English paper at the earliest possible moment. Even today the German nation is well informed upon a vast variety of topics respecting our organization, our preparations and our internal conditions, which it is highly undesirable that he should learn. The matter cannot be illustrated more clearly than by pointing out what an advantage it would be to our intelligence department at the war-office if our knowledge of the internal conditions of Germany in the midst of this war were equal in extent and intimacy to the German knowledge of our conditions.

In modern warfare the combatants no longer consist of selected forces numerically insignificant in proportion to the whole mass of the population. When whole peoples fight, the area upon which intelligence departments must operate is nothing less than the psychology of nations, and every revelation that increases enemy knowledge is prima facie to be discouraged.

It may therefore be safely predicted that should the United States of America become involved in any great war under modern conditions, it would be compelled, as we have been compelled, to subordinate every consideration—from those which are trivial, such as public curiosity, to those which are of high consequence, such as the liberty of the press—to the demands of military necessity. Every nation successfully organized for war has recognized these impenetrable truths. Japan, Russia, France, Germany, Austria and Italy have been compelled, simultaneously with the first clash of arms, to adopt severe measures of restriction over the press of their respective countries. It is certain that no nation will in future wage a first-class war without taking powers to regulate and control its press.

THE matter might at first sight appear open to dispute when the interference is carried from the field of journalism into that of cables. Yet the considerations involved in this branch of the subject are proved to be not less decisive. Great Britain has in the United States of America many staunch and precious friends whose warm sympathy with the allied cause has done much to sustain us in the anxieties and the dangers of the last twelve months. But she has also many implacable enemies, men whose descent and national affiliations make it certain that they would shrink from no step which would benefit the country of their origin, and would injure the country of their detestation. The activity of the cable censors in London, while often misdirected, has to my certain knowledge detected and prevented many schemes that were aimed against the interests of Great Britain. Some of these, at any rate, would have been carried out by illegality and bloodshed. In several cases which are within my personal knowledge, the same censorship has exposed and brought to punishment German spies in this country who were in communication with German sympathizers in the United States of America.

It may perhaps be assumed, therefore, that no one who gives close attention to the subject will dispute the right of a nation that is battling for its existence to exercise such a degree of supervision over cables leaving its shores as will enable it to detect and guard against the machinations of its enemies. I might add that intercepted cables have repeatedly established the existence of arrangements to carry contraband goods to Germany by the colorable device of interposing a neutral port between the point of departure and the German destination. Such discoveries, though annoying to neutrals who are fully entitled at their own risk to carry contraband, are indispensable to the exercise of the undisputed belligerent right of confiscating contraband.

I may, however, be told that while it may have been necessary to establish a rigid censorship both of the press and of cables, the censorship as it was applied in this country was incredibly stupid and incompetent. Indeed, I have seen such comments made in the American press with that freedom and vigor for which your journalists are famous. The first answer to this charge may be candidly made that it is at least partially true. Many inexplicable mistakes were undoubtedly made. But when I look back upon the feverish energies of those first two months of war, I marvel not that the mistakes were so many, but that they were so few. And yet there were very many.

Sir Frederick E. Smith

Who Organized the Present Censorship Work of the British Government

shorship was required. It was obligatory, therefore, that I should discover hundreds of officers and of civilians who, without a moment's preparation and without the guidance of either principle or precedent, should commence the actual work of censorship. For this work could not and would not wait. In the first week of war at least seventy cables were stopped the dispatch of which would have been vitally injurious to British interests. It is not surprising that the persons charged with these duties should have proceeded upon the rule that it was better for ten innocent cables to be stopped than for one mischievous cable to pass over the lines.

Every belligerent is bound to proceed upon this principle, for it is the especial quality of war to supersede and destroy all that ordered routine of life which we associate with peace.

Of course neutral nations suffer. Neutral nations always do suffer in war. In the American Civil War the operatives of Lancashire starved, and yet our diplomats refused to protest against the doctrine of "continuous voyage" with which the ingenuity of American judges was developing the older practice of international law. So, no doubt, American business men suffered greatly by the interference with their business cables, and American newspapers suffered greatly by the delay or suppression of interesting copy. Let no one suppose that I am in any way inclined to push the defense too far. The decisions taken were in many individual cases unnecessary and even stupid. In particular instances indefensible and even ludicrous decisions were taken, for, in the first few weeks, no harmonious co-ordination of principle was possible, and great discretion was necessarily left to subordinates, none of whom had any real previous training, and all of whom were properly determined to run no risks of injuring the public interests. I might refer, in passing, to an extreme case of overzeal, that of the suppression, for three days, of Mr. Asquith's and Sir Edward Grey's speeches.

But I can myself truthfully say that as long as I was director of the Press Bureau I spared neither time nor trouble to mitigate the errors that were inevitable. I repeatedly interviewed American journalists, many of whom were brought to my office by Mr. T. P. O'Connor, and I had already evolved, before I left the Bureau, a system which co-ordinated the cable-censorship with the press-censorship, securing in the main that the same decisions should be given upon the same points. This was LET this be considered upon the other side. We had to improvise, in a few days, premises, a staff, and a system. We had nothing to guide us. Like yourselves, we have always prided ourselves upon being a free people able to support the outspokenness and even the license of an uncontrolled press. We had never in our history had occasion for so much as military censors, as censorship is understood today; for the operations in South Africa were geographically so remote that little systematic cenundoubtedly a great reform, and, I am not so foolish as to suppose that no great mistakes were made at adoption, I am sure that a source of exasperation was removed.

It was certainly true while I was at the Bureau, and I am sure that was true of my successor, the present Chancellor, that no American complaint was ever brought to the Bureau which was not promptly and sympathetically examined with the single-hearted desire of finding a swift remedy if the circumstances rendered it possible.

I have sometimes seen complaints made that letters have been intercepted by the censor. The considerations which I have already indicated make it unreasonable and impossible that any belligerent should surrender the right, in special cases of suspicion, of opening correspondence. A private letter from a suspected source in England or a suspected person in the United States might not inconceivably afford the means of discovering a second Austrian outrage. No country in the world at war has ever, under modern conditions, sacrificed such a right, and confidently be predicted that no country in the future will do so. I can only claim that the exercise of this admitted right has never been more industriously and more sparingly made than by the British authorities in the course of the present war. I am aware of no case in which private correspondence has been interfered with, unless perhaps in error, except where there was ground for suspecting either the writer or the addressee.

I have, I hope, in these few observations, made it clear that I am unwilling to pose as a complete apologist for all that the censorship did or left undone. But I conceive that I am entitled to appeal to American critics for a somewhat more lively appreciation of the difficulties under which we labored.

AFTER all, we are fighting for our lives, as the United States has had to fight in the past and may not conceivably have to fight in the future. The primary activities of war are concerned with destroying the enemy. Censorship is only one of the secondary activities. It is to the primary and not to the secondary activities that the maximum of national endeavor and organization must be given on the sudden outbreak of an unexpected war. The best military brains in the country cannot be mobilized in hundreds, perhaps in thousands, for purposes of censorship. I hope and I believe that time and experience have corrected many exasperating tendencies, and I do not hesitate boldly to appeal to American commonsense and friendship to construe the acts and omissions of a much criticized public department, not in the light of their acknowledged errors, but rather in that of their acknowledged difficulties.

The South China Flood

THROUGH the State Department in Washington, The Christian Herald has received from Consul General Cheshire of Canton, China, details of the great inundations of July. The important dike at Chingyuan, at the junction of the West and East Rivers, gave way, which was the cause of flooding Canton. It will require a year to remedy the damage sustained by the Canton-Hankow Railway. Other dikes were reported broken. Kweilin (capital of Kwangsi) threatened to rise forty feet, and hundreds of people were drowned. There is great distress among country people, crops ruined, harvest being completely destroyed. The poorer class are selling girls into slavery to procure food. Brigandage is increasing and suffering is intense.

Coin of the Realm

By JEAN MAHAN PLANK

IT was two years after Peter and I were married, and when little Peterkind was just beginning to toddle, that Isobel's folks came to live right opposite us, in an "eastern house," as we call them here. Just like Mrs. Parker it was, too,—taking an eastern house instead of a California bungalow. Both the mother and daughter seemed to be always shrinking from something—dodging behind corners to hide from something. The rains, the fogs, and even the sunshine, were like so many enemies to be skidded away from.

Why, to me, running out in the rain to let the drops patter upon your face is like lying down to let a baby crawl over you and get its feet tangled up in your neck or your hair; while a fog is like life after one gets to understand that lots of beautiful things are just waiting to be given us if we simply follow the line of the next duty. I saw that in one of Peter's books. Going about in a fog is like going bravely into such a life; it means coming constantly upon beautiful surprises that seem, as I said, to be lying in wait. And as for sunshine—well, if you haven't gone on the hottest day in summer and stood for a minute in a meadow with the sun falling full upon yourself and the softly waving grasses between the fall of the light from the sky, and the answering warmth from the scented earth you've missed knowing something of what the smile of God must be like.

Well, that's the way Isobel had been brought up to shy away from everything. Living under perpetual shade-hats, and avoiding all but smooth surfaces, she came up to young womanhood with a delicate sort of prettiness that always reminded me of the wax flowers that Peter's grandmother made.

It was not strange that young Arnold fell in love with the girl. He was one of those strong, cheery fellows that always like best the things they have to take care of. He was handsome, too, and Isobel just raved over him at first until she got to the stage of not mentioning him at all. Then her eyes would follow every motion he made, and when he moved out of sight she would sink back upon her couch or her steamer chair and look as if the rest of us were made of glass.

She had got the habit of running over to see me every day or so, and she was really fond of little Peterkind. He is a darling, with such strong little fat legs, a chubby body and a way of wanting to love everyone with his arms. Isobel would always tell me eagerly about her own health, and the sensations of discomfort her mother had experienced through the night past; and after that she would settle back into the rocking-chair and listen with mild interest to what I might have to offer. I realized, however, that she didn't hear half that I was saying.

ONE morning I had just taken my sewing out on the front porch, and had dumped Peterkind into his corral, as Peter calls his little fence. The baby and I had settled down to exchanging ideas by means of different sorts of cooings that he and I understand perfectly well, when Isobel Parker crossed the street.

Our bungalow sits far back, and over the porch the white and cream blossoms of the Lady Banksia rose riot to the roof. Through the vines I watched the girl coming along the gravel path in her thin, high-heeled slippers. She kept her eyes anxiously upon the gravel, and swayed from side to side in her efforts to avoid pebbles and damp spots. When she had mounted the steps and sunk into a canvas porch chair, she drew a deep breath of relief. Then her face lighted up with a wonderfully sweet smile, and she gave me a somewhat belated greeting while she pointed appreciatively at one of Peterkind's dimples. The baby curved his arms to her and extended his plump chest in a vigorous crow. After Isobel had kissed him she sighed again and glanced at me.

"You look so well and strong, Rose Barlow," she said in a high, plaintive voice, "and—happy."

I searched about for the scissors, then bit off my thread in my eagerness to exclaim:

"Happy! My wellness and strongness are plain to be seen, but if you were to look all day you couldn't see how happy I am." I thought of Peter, and looked at Peterkind.

Isobel settled back in her chair, and I saw that there was more than daily discomforts on her mind this morning. Her thin, long face was pale, and her large, serious eyes looked tired as if is usually such a big one, and leaves us with so much poverty and bitterness and ill-feeling of all sorts on our hands that we get after a while to feel that there's nothing but ashes in the world. But all of a sudden Love comes and taps us on the shoulder; and if we turn about and open the door of our hearts wide to him, he tells us what to want. And while we still have to 'pay the price' if we take it, yet Love touches the base metal with which we have had to pay before, and it is transmuted into something precious. It's as if we were in another realm, and handling another kind of coin—a magic kind, that when you part with it has power to give you joy in the giving. So, when the price that we pay is pain, why—"

I stopped suddenly and looked again at Peterkind. He turned his big blue eyes up at me, and laughed with the little confidential chuckle he has reserved for me. I almost forgot Isobel.

POOR little creature! As I looked at her I wondered that even such a feeble flame of passion did not finally consume her.

I laid down my work and began eagerly to try to find a way for Isobel. But with the first suggestion, the girl commenced instinctively to dodge and slip around corners just as her mother always does when I mention common-sense methods for getting rid of her ailments.

"Why, how could I?" cried Isobel excitedly. "Live in such a small way? What would people think?—my mother's friends. And exercise!" She rose slowly and I thought she looked a bit hurt. "You little know, Rose, I must suffer from lack of strength."

But Isobel is really a sweet-natured girl, and she stooped to kiss Peterkind before she started down the steps. It was an expression of resignation upon her pale face. As she reached the ground, another of my lights came to me:

"You have to pick your poises to make them bloom."

She went on without answering, and I had to snatch up Peterkind and hug him real tight to console myself for not being able to help up other people's lives. Then I saw Peter coming up the street.

He cast a look backward toward Isobel, who was slowly ascending the steps of her father's house. He came up to our porch, he drew both me and the baby behind the cabing roses for a happy minute before he asked me with an amused smile: "Was Isobel over here?"

"Yes."

"Well, she'll surely have something to step out of the way of."

"Why, what do you mean?"

"You know those stranded people from the east who have been here a couple of weeks over in Los Angeles? Those eastern doctors send 'em out here to get rid of 'em, and make 'em think they can live in California without money."

"Yes, I know what—"

"One of them has smallpox."

"Mercy! Well—I guess it isn't spread." I remarked in the dissatisfied tone of one who has always lived safely and securely in Pasadena. I handed Peter the boy, who had been eagerly curving his arms toward his father, and I started in to take the dinner out of the cooker.

"I know what Mrs. Parker will do," Peter called after me with masculine cruelty, "when she gets that virus. She'll say: 'Oh, don't talk to me about it. I don't want to hear it.' But she'll be safe. She'll just dodge around the corner, as you call it."

Before Peter left that afternoon he told me that he would have to stay at the greenhouse unusually late, and that he would not be home until after dark. So when Peterkind was in his crib and the supper all ready but lighting the gas under the coffee, I went out to sit on the porch.

I sat there counting the colors in the trunk of a eucalyptus. There were rose, green, lavender, Nile-green, electric blue, and purple. I was so interested in listening to the young moe-birds getting their little beds ready for the night, that an hour passed unnoted before I saw, peeping above a gray cloud on the horizon, a golden rim which widened quickly into a full yellow moon. As I watched the color change rapidly to a dull, bluish tint, a dim, white figure floated down the Parkers' steps, and fairly flew across the street. It came winging its way over our gravel, and I saw that it was Isobel.

She almost fell at the foot of the steps, and I got up to meet her. Her face was white.

"Rose!" she gasped, "It's awful—"

THE 'LOPEMENT

By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

WHEN Grandma wore that bonnet,

An' Grampa wore this hat,

They took a horse 'n buggy

An' 'loped—jes' think o' that!

He said, "You're awful pretty!"

She said, "You're brave an' true. . ."

An' then, beneath the bonnet,

I think they kissed, don't you?

When Grandma's hair was golden,

An' Grampa's hair was brown,

They ran away together,

The talk of all the town.

Some folks said, "Goodness gracious!"

But from the sky above

A gentle breeze was singin'

The song of youth an' love.

When Grandma had a dimple,

An' Grampa's smile was gay,

They took a horse 'n buggy,

An' rode fer miles away.

An' oh! they loved each other,

(What do you think o' that?)

When Grandma wore that bonnet,

An' Grampa wore this hat.

she might have been crying. She had a high forehead, and wore her dark hair drawn back under a wide band of white satin. Her mouth was small, and when she was a bit excited a slight rose tinge would come into her cheeks. Her face always seemed to me to be ready to burst into beauty at the first shining of the real love light. As I watched her, she put one thin, delicate hand up to her long, white neck, and fingered a chain of black beads that hung there. It was like Isobel to dress to suit her moods.

I was wondering what troubled her, when one of my "lights"—as I call them—came to me, and the words flashed into my mind without my thinking them. I said them over out loud.

"Pay the price and take it!"

I don't know where I saw that, but it's in one of Peter's books. I think it must have been Emerson's, for I read his works more than any of the others' because his picture looks so much like Peter. It makes him seem nearer to me.

Isobel looked at me in a puzzled way. I tried to explain.

"Why, I read that somewhere. But it seems to me it might be taken in two ways; or at least I think we pay in two different kinds of money. Now, when we want everything we see that shines and glitters, and make up our minds to pay the price and take it, why, the price

She moved impatiently. Her face had not changed its expression, and I couldn't tell whether she had been listening or not. I surely could not tell from her next words.

"Rose," she said faintly, "it's dreadful to have frail health and never be able to do things like other people. Rose—Jim Arnold wants to marry me."

I was taken aback, for Isobel is a girl who likes to be reserved. After the first gasp I said heartily:

"Why, isn't that nice—" I stopped, for I saw that her eyes were filled with tears and her face was flushed.

"But I can't," she said presently, "it is out of the question. Mother says that it would never do for me to accept the responsibilities of marriage. I'm not strong enough. And she says she'd just be worried to death all the time, and she can't stand it. She'd never consent. And then, too, I'd be afraid. Jim isn't rich, you know, and in my delicate health how could I get along without the comforts I've always been used to? Why, he couldn't keep a machine, and you know I'm not able to get about without one. And father isn't rich enough to give us all those things. Mother said this morning: 'Why, what if you should have to do your own work?' She is nearly in hysterics whenever the subject is mentioned." Isobel wiped her eyes.

"I—love him, too."

"All! Jim Arnold!" She covered her face with her hands. "Why, Isobel! Here, sit down! What is it?" He's been working to help those poor people over in Los Angeles—stranded ones—and—her voice broke to a wail—"they had smallpox and he's got it." She dropped her head on her arms. "Got it!" I echoed stupidly. "Are you sure?" "He raised her head. "I talked with the doctor myself." "Why, where?" "They've taken him to the old Hamilton house, here—it's to be torn down, you know—and the doctor says he is comfortable but, oh, he's there all alone, in an old colored woman who's had it." He sprang to her feet. "Rose, I want just to walk alone awhile in your back garden; may I? Mother distresses me so. She keeps reproaching me and reproaching Jim, and everybody else; and when I answer, she says: 'I don't talk about it! I don't want to hear about it.'" I nodded speechlessly, and Isobel rapidly past the calla-lily bed and disappeared behind the bungalow. I sat there thinking. That was fine of young Arnold. So young, and so bustling to make his place in the world, and yet finding time to help the who didn't know how to think and hustle for themselves! That promise a big, full life for him, whatever came. But it was an awful price to pay—smallpox!

AS just thinking this when Isobel suddenly came around the corner again. Almost mechanically I said my last thought aloud. "It was an awful price to pay." "The girl had reached the step, and with a flash she faced me with a look I never had seen in her face. "An awful price to pay?" she asked in hollow voice. "Well, you needn't think, Rose Barlow, that you are the only one who can pay prices." "That she whirled about and went skimming and flying over the walks at the street like a furious robin chasing a sparrow. "I stood staring after her for a full minute before I asked aloud: "Well, what did she mean by that?" "Then the voice that I love best answered with: "Are you talking to yourself or the moon, Rosebud?" and I was glad enough to run down the steps and hide my perplexity and my face on Peter's shoulder. "About an hour after supper, I saw Dr. Marshall's automobile draw up to the Parker house. I didn't go over, because it was not an uncommon thing for him to be summoned there, but I did wonder whether the excitement over which Isobel was laboring hadn't made her really sick. It was not until noon of the next day that I learned what had happened.

Peter it was who told me. He came in to dinner with the queer look on his face that I knew very well meant news. "Dr. Marshall was in the greenhouse today," he said. "Did he say anything about the Parkers?" I asked anxiously. "He gave me the latest news from young Arnold." "He did?" I was eager now. "What did he say? Is it really smallpox?" "Oh, it's that all right. But who do you think is with him—helping to nurse him?" "Why—I—"

"Isobel!" "Isobel Parker?" Peter nodded emphatically. I stared at him while visions of Mrs. Parker's face flashed before me.

Peter went on. "Dr. Marshall says that he was called last night to the Parkers' to see Isobel's mother, who was having fainting spells. It was a long time before he could get the straight of it. It seems that Mrs. Parker had seen Isobel come running into the house just at dusk—"

"She had been over here." "Yes—and she ran up the stairs to her room and locked herself in. An hour later, her mother went to the room, and not getting any answer, tried the door and found it unlocked. She went in and saw a note pinned on the side of the mirror. It just said: 'I've gone to nurse Jim Arnold.' That was all." "But how did she get there? Was the machine—"

"She had evidently taken a suitcase, and she slipped out without anyone seeing her. She must have gone on a car."

"Isobel!" I exclaimed. "Alone—after dusk on a street-car carrying a suitcase!" I tried to see it, but imagination failed me. "Well—what will become of Mrs. Parker?" Then I buttonholed my husband. "Peter," I whispered, "when Isobel went out into our garden, I believe—"

"What do you believe, Rosebud?" asked the dear voice as the strong arms went about me.

"I believe she heard a voice, or saw a light, or something."

"You little mystic!" laughed Peter. But he drew me closer, and as we looked into each other's eyes, we both knew that we understood.

AFTER Peter was gone, I decided that it would be only neighborly at least to go over and see if I could do anything, although I shivered a bit, for people in hysterics always give me chills.

But to my utter surprise, I found myself, for the first time since she came there, liking Mrs. Parker. She lay upon her sofa as usual, but she quietly held out her hand to me, and drew me to a seat by her side. When she began to talk, it was with sense and I wondered what had come over the woman. As I thought about it afterward, I came to the conclusion that the real things that we come up against in this world haven't the power to scare us like the shadows we create ourselves. There is something about realities that always give us a sense of security, no matter what they are. And Mrs. Parker was, for the first time likely, facing a thing that did not need her imagination to magnify it. It was big enough. And some way she seemed to me to rest in it. She even had a sort of pleased air when she spoke of Isobel, as if she were proud of her. When I left, she asked me to bring the baby over, which I did, and she sat for an hour holding him and seeming to draw comfort from his dear little body.

WE got news now and then from the Hamilton house, and Mrs. Parker surely had need for all her new poise when, just after we learned that young Arnold was on the road to recovery, came the word that Isobel was sick. That made even me go about with a heavy heart. I kept thinking of the girl living out the rest of her life with her poor pretty little face disfigured.

The weeks wore on until a day came when the doctors said that everything was declared all right, and Isobel could be brought back to her home in a day or so.

I went over one morning to see if I could help Mrs. Parker. As I passed the sun-parlor, I saw a figure sitting in the steamer chair, and I stood stock still in amazement.

It was Isobel. But a transfigured Isobel, sure enough. There were two or three "misplaced dimples," as she always called them afterward, but through her face shone a light that came from somewhere within. Isobel had become beautiful.

She held out her hand and beckoned me close to her.

"Rose, dear," she whispered, "I've been 'paying the price,' but you've no idea what a joy it was. Why, Rose, I never before in my life knew what it was to be happy. And, my dear—now I'm going to take everything I want and pay for it. But"—she drew my head down and touched my cheek with hers—"it's all to be under the rules of that realm—you know."

As I was clasping the girl in my arms, young Arnold, big, handsome and joyous, strode across the verandah and into the sun-parlor. Although his eyes glued themselves to Isobel's, I couldn't help stopping to exclaim about the fact that his face hadn't a mark on it.

He laughed—a breezy laugh right from the heart.

"Of course not," he cried, and pointed to Isobel. "This girl saw to that all right."

With one big swoop he gathered her up in his arms, and I melted away from the sun-parlor and left them alone together.

British Churches and the War By DENIS CRANE

ENGLAND, every grade of society has made its contribution to the Great War. Men of birth and privilege are fighting side by side in the trenches with miners, and bricklayers, and men of the humblest class, in a bona fide brotherhood that bespeaks a new social order when the war shall be over. The churches, too, have lent to the ranks many thousands of men. A typical case is that of the Nottingham Mission, a great religious center under Methodist auspices. Associated with it are various institutes and social organizations for brightening the lives of workers with whom Nottingham, as a great lace-making city, abounds.

To the present, 630 men from various departments of the mission have gone to the color and to watch over the spiritual and temporal needs of these and of their families has imposed new and interesting duties on the minister and his helpers.

Fry Sunday evening, for example, at an appropriate part of the service, when nearly three thousand people are assembled, the roll of honor, containing the names of the men and the branches of service to which they are attached, is read over together with the names of those who have fallen and then the congregation stands bowed in silent intercession. A suitable hymn is then sung and the people are encouraged to mingling national aspiration with individual sacrifice.

The families and friends of the men are regularly visited and their temporal needs attended to. Sometimes it is counsel they require, sometimes nursing in sickness. By this means close ties of sympathy are woven between the church and the people.

At regular intervals an individual letter is sent to every one of the absentees. It gives the news of the mission, the news of the city, gives counsel for living the Christian life under war conditions, and offers to do any service that may be required either by the man or by his family. It would be easy to print or to duplicate these letters, but as the utmost value is attached to the intimate personal touch, the whole 630 letters are written by hand and signed personally by the minister. Certainly a labor of love.

The war has brought many recruits to the church workers. Men and women who were before idle have found new points of contact with the church through the common interest. Every night of the week, eight men, changed from night to night, take charge of the recreational rooms set apart for soldiers under training. None of these men ever did any work for God before now they are eager and tireless, and their spiritual life has been deepened.

That the men who have gone on military service are steadfast in the faith is clear from many indications. One of the official censors of soldiers' letters remarked recently to the Bishop of London that nearly every letter closed with some religious reference—a blessing, a request for prayer, or the like. Said he: "I never knew before that the men were so religious."

All the letters received by the Nottingham Mission from its members at the front contain assurances that the men are witnessing a good confession. But there is a better proof. Requests of every kind are sent to the mission by the men—for musical instruments, for creature comforts, for books, and a dozen other things, but the most frequent request is for a packet of the mission's hymn-sheets. These the men distribute among their comrades and, in idle hours, hold a "sing-song."

The Nottingham Mission is not the only church that has sent a large contingent to the front. The Manchester Mission (Rev. S. F. Collier) has sent upwards of five hundred. A mission at Hull has sent three hundred and fifty. And in smaller numbers men have gone from every church of any size in the British Isles.

Elijah Taken Up to Heaven

International Sunday School Lesson for October 10. II Kings 2:1-12

The Charged Magnet

By Amos R. Wells

WAS Elijah ready to go? He seems to have been gloriously ready. Most men in his position of great responsibility would have said, "My work is not done. I am still at the height of my powers. Here is only a young man to take my place. He is not equal to the heavy task. Here are all these pupils looking up to me for teaching and direction. How can I leave them just now?" But Elijah seems to have realized that all men's lives are incomplete, and the greater the life, the more intense and full of work, the more incomplete it will be at death.

One of the most impressive buildings in London is the splendid marble mansion of Lord Rothschild, one of the richest men in the world. It is a beautiful house, exquisitely finished except at the end of one of the cornices; that is left rough and incomplete. So with the house of every orthodox Jew; some part of it must be left unfinished as a token that the owner is on earth merely as a transient guest, and has no time for a completed life. He must look to the next world for completion and satisfaction.

And yet there was Elisha, springing along by Elijah's side on the way to Gilgal and on to Jericho. Can any man's life be held to be incomplete if it is continued in the life of a friend? Was Arthur Hallam's life incomplete when Tennyson prolonged it forever by "In Memoriam"? or the life of Socrates when Plato continued it in his immortal dialogues? Confucius said wisely, "Have no friends not equal to yourself." By that he must have meant, "Make your friends equal to yourself by giving them freely of your best." Thus you make sure of a continued life whatever happens to yourself, as a manufacturer entrusts the secrets of his manipulations to his younger partners.

No wonder that Elisha was annoyed when the sons of the prophets assumed to tell him something about Elijah that he did not know. Once that greatest of all living physicists, Lord Kelvin, visited some well-known electrical work with a friend. The senior foreman, quite unaware of who his visitor was, explained everything minutely, and gave him a patronizing lecture on the workings of electricity. Kelvin's friend was on the point of telling the foreman whom he was instructing, but Kelvin gave him an amused signal to keep quiet. At the close of the inspection Kelvin quietly asked the foreman, "What, then, is electricity?" Confused, the man had to confess that he did not know. "Well, well," said Lord Kelvin gently, "that is the only thing about electricity which you and I do not know." So Elisha might well have turned on those theological students and asked them, "What is death?"

Elisha's faithful following of Elijah is a standing parable of Christian devotion. It is thus that we are to follow our Master. Perhaps the saddest words in the Bible are those of Christ in Gethsemane, "Could ye not watch with me one hour?" If any are sadder they are these, "Then all the disciples left him, and fled." Too many of us Christians are like the sons of the prophets; we watch our Lord in his Gethsemanes, but we "stand to view afar off."

What was the secret of Elijah's power? What gave that old man such spiritual vigor that before him the very flood of Jordan divided and left dry ground? Dr. Cuyler used to tell about a great horseshoe magnet which his college professor used to charge with electricity, when it would hold up four thousand pounds. Then he would shut off the current, and in an instant the power was gone and the magnet could not hold up a needle. "My brother," said Dr. Cuyler, "encircle your soul with faith and let the divine electricity of the love of Jesus Christ charge it. Then you can lift anything; you can do anything that God wants you to do." Elijah's soul was charged with that divine electricity.

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

In thy presence is fulness of joy; at thy right hand there are pleasures for evermore. Ps. 16

These beautiful words are generally applied to the experience of the people of God, when they have passed from this world. But if they are to be enjoyed by us after death, why should they not be entered on now? For what is death? It is not a condition in which the soul remains. It is only a step, a momentary wrench, the laying aside of the implement, made of clay, which we call the body, and which has served us for the time of our earthly sojourn. A man may be traveling on a non-stop train. At the moment of its highest speed, he takes off his outer coat, as he stands in the observation car, and drops it on the track. He is the same man, traveling in the same direction, and at the same speed. The only difference is that he has left the garment miles behind. Death is a putting off of the body, and the learning to a more ethereal and perfect one. If, at a moment after death, we enter into the fulness of joy and the everlasting pleasures, there is no reason why we should not at least begin to here, and we may begin them, if we will cultivate the sense of the presence of God, and sit with Christ in the heavenly places. Death will make differences for us, but not the vast differences as men generally suppose.

Was Elisha wise in desiring a double portion of Elijah's spirit, the portion of the eldest son and successor? Yes! Most men fail in not being ambitious enough. They are ambitious for the little things, such as money or power or fame, but not for the really great things, such as a chance to serve men widely and powerfully. Longfellow's metaphor is a true one: "If you would hit the mark, you must aim a little above it; every arrow that flies feels the attraction of the earth." It is impossible for a follower of Christ to have too much of the right kind of ambition.

No wonder that to such a man as Elisha was revealed the glory of the great translation! May our eyes also be opened to see the flaming splendors of death!

Echoes from the Holy Land

ONE of the remarkable features of the climate and atmosphere of Syria is the prevalence of whirlwinds and waterspouts both on land and over the sea. They are most prevalent in the deep trough of the Jordan valley and also in Coela-Syria, where the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon form another trough for the winds. They sometimes do an immense amount of damage, and often at most unexpected seasons. As a touring missionary in Northern Syria I often met the whirlwinds. They appear in the shape of a column of dust perhaps two to five feet in diameter, rising straight in the air for several hundred feet, opening like a large funnel at the top. The lower end touches the ground and swings over the surface, picking up dust and pebbles in its path. The chaff and even grain on the threshing floors is sucked up and disappears. Small fish are sometimes drawn up when the swaying column passes over a stream or lake. Many years ago I tried the experiment of riding through the swaying column of a rather innocent looking whirlwind. My horse was terrified, and I had difficulty in keeping my seat in the saddle. It is impossible to say exactly what did happen. It took me some time to find my hat, and several days to get the sand and dust from my eyes and ears and clothing, and I have never tried it again.

Gilgal, Bethel, Jericho, Jordan. Samuel toured these districts with all his court of justice and was the first circuit judge. Elijah moved from place to place with his school of the prophets. Christ found no better way to train his twelve apostles than to journey over these same hills and valleys with his little band. Modern missionaries find no better plan than to plant little schools, which are also preaching stations. I spent twelve years of my life as a touring missionary and averaged more than 200 days away from home in the saddle, taking with me where possible, native helpers.

"Sons of the prophets." Not literal sons, but used exactly as we use "Sons of Princeton," "Sons of Yale."

"As the Lord liveth." A solemn asseveration to express his loyalty.

"Mantle." In all probability the exact counterpart of the shepherd coat of today; a seamless, coarse woolen garment with square shoulders and two holes for the arms, often used as a rug, a saddlecloth and a receptacle for bundles. When folded it can be carried on the arm or shoulder and could easily have been used to "smite the wars." Elisha's request for a double portion of Elijah's spirit recalls Solomon's choice of wisdom. The "chariotry" signified the mounted force of the nation, to which Elijah's presence is here compared.

TEACHERS: Would you like to know how to hold that restless boy's attention? Would you like to know how to induce your pupil to study their lessons before coming to Sunday school? Would you like to know how to get them to bring their Bibles to Sunday school and be to direct their use of them in the class? Would you like to know how to open up the lesson study, how to develop the lesson and how to apply its spiritual truths? Would you like to know how to do successfully these and a dozen other things connected with your Sunday school work?

Who can give you the answer to these troublesome "hows" so well as those Sunday school teachers themselves who have found their practical solution and actually and efficiently worked them out? Mr. Frank L. Brown, Joint General Secretary of the World's Sunday School Association, is securing from six hundred Sunday school superintendents whose schools have had noteworthy success, the names and addresses of their most successful teachers. To these thousands of chosen teachers a list of such practical questions as those just mentioned, to be sent with the request that they reply plainly "how" they have succeeded in doing these difficult things.

From the wealth of material has secured Mr. Brown will select the very best for publication in the How Column of the Christian Herald. The list of questions asked is printed here, and any other teacher who has found workable answers to the list is invited to send in brief statements of his or her experiences. You do not need to answer all the questions. Answer one dealing with points in which you have had striking success. And the How Column will pass on your suggestions to thousands of other teachers who are eager to learn what you have discovered.

A list of questions is also being sent to superintendents, and some of the best answers to these will also be published.

Teachers or officers are invited to submit any question on Sunday school methods, and when these are printed all are to be invited to contribute answers.

Watch the How Column for just the advice you are seeking, and you can contribute to its information. Superintendents and advisers will rejoice together in increased efficiency in the help and blessing that will come to multitudes of Sunday school students far and near.

Address all communications for the How Column to Mr. Frank L. Brown, 247 New York Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Progress in Temperance Work

THE state of Washington has been chosen for the annual National W. C. T. U. Convention, which will be held October 9-14. In addition to the national, district and county conventions, the W. C. T. U. has held two big Interstate Prohibition Campaign Conventions, one for the South at Jacksonville, Fla., and the other for the Northwest at Boise, Idaho. Instructive and strong exhibits have been shown at the Panama-Pacific Exposition in San Francisco and at the Made-in-the-U. S. Exposition in New York City. Temperance education in the public schools has been actively promoted. "Frances Willard Day" has been appointed in the public schools of Tennessee the fourth state to pass a law for this purpose, the others being Alabama, New Mexico and Kansas.

THE abolition of the saloon has been steadily pursued by the W. C. T. U. At the last convention, there were but nine white states on the prohibition roll. This year sees the number doubled, Virginia, Colorado, Oregon, Washington, Arizona, Alabama, Arkansas, Iowa and Idaho being added. The Arizona law went into effect last January. The same month, the Alabama legislature banished the saloons.

THE campaigns this year include South Carolina and Ohio. In the former state, the temperance workers have made a strong contest for prohibition, churches and kindred bodies meeting for success at the polls on September 1. In Idaho, Montana, South Dakota, Vermont, the last named a former prohibition state, and Alaska, W. C. T. U. workers are striving with a view to carrying the prohibition law at the fall elections. There has been great activity among the workers in New York state, in Pennsylvania, where county option was defeated), in Chicago (which has had a notable dry campaign) and in Minnesota, which is fast becoming "dry" under the new county option law that went into operation March 1, 1915.

On September 14 South Carolina decided for state-wide prohibition by a vote of nearly two and one half to one. Returns from forty-three out of forty-four counties showed a vote for prohibition approximating 33,500, and about 14,000 against. In one county only, Charleston, was prohibition defeated by a large majority, ten to one. Of the fifteen counties which now have dispensaries selling whisky, ten voted for prohibition. The new law will go into effect January 1. This election comes at the end of a fight running back for nearly a quarter of a century, but state-wide prohibition had not previously been voted upon by the people of this state.

THE new prohibitory laws of Colorado, Oregon, Washington and Virginia go into effect January 1, 1916. Statutory prohibition (enacted September, 1914), in Virginia will become effective on November 1, 1916. In all of these victories over the rum power, the W. C. T. U. has been a strong force.

THE W. C. T. U. Convention at Seattle will meet in Plymouth Congregational Church on October 9 and continue five days. Among the chief speakers will be Bishop Walter Summer, Mr. Daniel Poling, and Dr. Mary Stone, the noted Chinese medical missionary and leader of the W. C. T. U. in that mission field.

STATISTICS recently made public by the United States Treasury Department show a decrease in the ten months from July 1, 1914, to May 1, 1915, of $13,713,790 in revenues from taxes on spirits. J. A. S.

Mesa Verde Cliff Dwellings

DR. J. WALTER FEWKES, of the Smithsonian Bureau of American Ethnology, left recently for Mesa Verde National Park in southwestern Colorado to continue the supervision of excavation and repair on the prehistoric dwellings in the vicinity of Cliff Palace and Spruce Tree House. The Mesa Verde ruins are situated on the Mesa Verde in Montezuma County, Colorado, in the side canyon of the Mancos, and are regarded as the largest and most remarkable examples of cliff dwellings in the United States. These ruins were discovered in 1888. In that year two ranchers riding over the Mesa Verde through its labyrinth of canyons, in search of stray cattle suddenly came upon a deep canyon, and beheld in a grotto in the opposite cliff a wide town in ruins, its crumbling buildings, walls and towers unmistakably the work of prehistoric man. It looked like a city, and so they named it Cliff Palace. On the same day they discovered, not far away, another large cliff dwelling which they named Spruce Tree House, and a giant spruce tree which grew in front of the ancient ruins. About 1905 the Mesa Verde was made a National Park. A scenic road has been constructed, over which one can now ride from the town of Mancos, on the D. & R. G. Railroad, to the largest of the ruins. Spruce Tree House has a distinct likeness to a gigantic hotel built in a cave with a crescent shaped roof, the floor of the cave being about 50 feet above the bottom of the canyon and the roof 80 feet high. Its total length is 216 feet, and its greatest width 89 feet. In places the rooms were originally three stories in height, the final story at present having no roof except the top of the cave, but most of the rooms now to be seen are on the first floor, although in some places a second story is still standing. There have been traced 144 separate rooms in this great structure, besides eight subterranean ceremonial chambers, known as kivas.

Cliff Palace, the second of these important ruins, is nearly three times the size of Spruce Tree House, and has over two hundred rooms. It is approached by means of steps cut in the rock and by ladders.

New Land Found in the Arctic

WITH a few tragic exceptions, exploration parties that have been given up as lost in the Arctic eventually have reappeared, and with more or less dramatic effect. Within the past month the world was warned to expect no further word from the Canadian Government arctic exploring and surveying expedition which, led by Vilhjalmur Stefansson, set out from Victoria, B. C., in June, 1913. But on September 16 the schooner Ruby arrived from Herschel Island with dispatches from Stefansson and most interesting reports of work he has thus far accomplished.

Vilhjalmur Stefansson

men returned to civilization, with their tale of dangers met and overcome such as only the Arctic can divulge.

Stefansson and the men with him went farther east to Collinson Point, reaching it on December 15. In January Stefansson purchased a new gasoline schooner and new outfits, and set out again for the north. On April 7, 1914, Stefansson took two of his companions, Ole Anderson and Storker Storkerson, and pressed on to the north, sending the rest of the party back. After the return of this party, nothing more was heard of Stefansson, and the Canadian authorities, in whose service Stefansson was working, finally announced that hope of seeing him alive again had been given up. This announcement had hardly been made before word was brought that the power schooner Polar Bear had found Stefansson and his companions on Banks Island in excellent health and spirits. The Polar Bear carried Stefansson and his party to Herschel Island for new supplies. After starting north with his two companions on April 7, 1914, Stefansson worked his way over broken ice falls across much open water on a course parallel with the west coast of Prince Patrick Island, about seventy-five miles off shore. Near seventy-six degrees forty minutes north they found that the ice conditions and the drift of the ice made further progress impossible, so they changed their course toward Prince Patrick Island, being carried nearly fifty miles south before they made land. From this point they proceeded north, charting the coast line of Prince Patrick Island which had been left uncharted by McClintock's expedition in 1853. On June 18, 1914, from a post of observation on a fifty-foot cake of ice one of the men sighted new land to the northeast. This was about 78 degrees north and 177 degrees west. Stefansson and his party followed the coast line of this new land for about 100 miles, the coast line running in a direction somewhat south of east. They penetrated nearly twenty miles inland, where, at a height of 2,000 feet, higher hills were seen in all directions, from north to east. The land is therefore of considerable size. Arctic flora of all kinds was abundant, but as summer was close at hand the party turned toward their base, discovering in their return trip a number of small islands. Before starting out Stefansson himself said this regarding the expedition and its aims:

"It may never bring a result measurable into dollars and cents, but surely, if it has any success, add materially to our knowledge of the earth even though it should not happen to discover any land, and if new land be discovered they (the Canadian Government) do not take it for granted that it will be forever valueless."

"In one sense the exploration is unique. It may be considered an undertaking to test the validity of a theory. Dr. Nansen has argued vehemently, and to some men's minds conclusively, that the unexplored portion of the Arctic Ocean is a deep plain practically, or more probably entirely, devoid of land. Other students of the North, such as General A. W. G. G. and Dr. R. H. Harris, feel equally convinced that there is land of considerable area lying undiscovered in the Polar Sea, and Admiral Peary, on an elevation of 2,000 feet near Cape Thomas Hubbard, has even seen land to the west. With the conservatism of a man of great experience, he says that he is not sure of the existence of any land upon which he has not actually put his foot, and is not, therefore, sure if what he saw was land and not a cloud bank."

Stefansson's friends have always been confident that he would be able to take care of himself in the Arctic and at when he returned he would bring them the solution of at least a part of the mystery of that region.

The southern wing of Stefansson's party, from whom he separated in the spring of 1914, have spent the intervening time in the Mackenzie delta changing coasts hitherto only partially known and making soundings off shore to determine the contour and limits of the continental shelf. They made a number of attempts to get into communication with Stefansson, but were prevented by ice conditions from reaching his appointed rendezvous.

COMMODORE PEARY'S successful quest of the North Pole solved only one of the mysteries of the Arctic. Many students of exploration have felt that there was a great continent yet undiscovered, lying between Alaska and the Pole and west of the Arctic lands already discovered; and in June, 1913, Vilhjalmur Stefansson, who had already conducted several hazardous enterprises in the same field, left Victoria, British Columbia, with three vessels and a full complement of men to make another attack on the mystery of the North. The steam whaler Karluk was the largest of the three and the one upon which they depended most for success. The general plan was to cruise northward as far as possible and establish winter quarters upon any land that might be available. Failing to find land in a direct northern course, they would sail eastward and establish a base as far north as possible on Banks Land or Prince Patrick Island, from which point they could travel by sled north and northwest. The summer of 1913 was the worst known in years in the Arctic. Ice conditions made progress almost impossible. Late in the summer they were able to make a new start from Point Barrow sailing for Prince Patrick Island. In two days they encountered more ice. The Karluk was caught fast in the ice pack. Deciding that the craft was frozen in for the winter Stefansson took a party ashore. Stefansson and his party were caught for a week on an island four miles off shore, during which time a fierce gale swept the ice westward. When they finally reached Point Barrow again, they learned that the Karluk had been seen drifting west. This was the last that was heard of the Karluk until Captain Bartlett and twelve of his twenty-five in the week with the idea possibly of advancing on Constantinople from the rear, a project which hardly seems feasible. In spite of the apparent tameness of this campaign for some time lately, the losses on both sides have been heavy. All told perhaps there have been 350,000 casualties in this campaign to date.

The Austro-Italian campaign has again relapsed into dullness, the expected battles on a large scale on the Isonzo River line not having taken place. There has been fighting on this line north of Monfalcone, near Gradisca, on the Triest front and farther north at Tolmino, but these encounters have not led to anything. On the Trent front the Italians are not progressing. After six months of more or less hard fighting the positions are practically the same as at the conclusion of the first week.

all the week to be characterized by almost continuous artillery drives, general along the whole front from the sea to lower Alsace. These duels were very rarely followed by infantry attacks.

There were four air raids on London during the past week, but the censors have permitted few details thereof to be published. Rumors speak of a comparatively large number of casualties as a result, but there is no certainty. The Allies returned the compliment by raiding several places in southern Germany, notably Treves and Donaueschingen, but details are also lacking.

The campaign in the east has been a continuation of the German effort to reach and seize the railroad running from Rovno to Vilna, along which line they apparently intend to make their winter quarters.

Farther north General von Mackensen's troops drove back the Russian forces steadily along the line of the Kobrin-Sunines railroad, and ended the week by the capture of the city of Prinsk, an important point strategically about 28 miles to the east of the Rovno-Vilna railroad. Still farther north, Archduke Leopold's army drove eastward from Walkowsky and attained finally a position to the northeast of Slonim, from whence its artillery could command this same railroad.

Southeast of Grodno there was some heavy fighting, which terminated in the Russians retreating to the eastward and to the northeastward to Lida, in the vicinity of which town a battle is now raging. If successful here, the Germans will cut the Vilna-Rovno railroad at another point.

Farther north along the Duna River there has been determined fighting, which has resulted in the Russians being driven across that river, the left bank thereof falling into German hands. Dunaburg itself is threatened from the west by von Hindenburg's forces moving east along the Poneviesch-Dunaburg railroad, and now within a few miles of the town. This railroad and the railroad from Dunaburg to Riga have been cut by the Germans, Dunaburg reduced to one line of effective communication.

DISPATCHES by way of London, September 20, announce the occupation of Vilna by the German forces, and that a portion of the Russian army between Vilna, Lida and Vileikais practically surrounded and has only one railway in their hands by which to escape. Field Marshal von Hindenburg in co-operation with Archduke Leopold of Bavaria is making the attempt to cut off the retreat.

BY a combined land and sea attack the French and British forces have been able to administer a serious blow to the German fortifications along the Belgian coast, destroying four munitions depots.

You know this trade-mark through national periodical advertising

IT costs a great deal to make one thing at a time—to supply the need of one man, one woman, or one family.

But it costs proportionately very little to make enough of the same thing to supply a hundred million people—or a reasonably large part of the hundred million.

That is why you can get many things very cheaply that you could not get at all if they were made for you alone—or for part of the people in your town or your state.

That is why every progressive American manufacturer thinks first of the hundred million and tries to sell to every one of them that possibly can use his product.

He aims at volume of business because he knows that every increase in quantity cuts down his manufacturing cost, enabling him to lower prices or improve quality, which in turn will add to his volume and reduce his manufacturing cost once more.

It is an endless chain: more volume—less cost—lower prices or better quality—more volume—less cost again—and so on.

But this chain could never be made without national advertising and trade-mark identification because these two forces are the things that make volume possible—the six-cipher kind of volume—the only kind that is recognized as volume in these days of big figures.

Trade-marks and national advertising are the two most valuable public servants in business today. Their whole tendency is to raise qualities and standardize them, while reducing prices and stabilizing them.

Mrs. G. A. C. of East Long Meadow, Mass., writes: "God has many times answered prayer for us and given healing. Recently my husband was spared an operation through prayer."

Mrs. M. B., Union, N. Y., writes: "I asked the prayers of the Christian Herald Prayer League more than a year since, and although it was so very hard to bear up under the death of a loved one, yet He has sustained me and answered other requests in a wonderful way."

Other letters show God's concern for the practical details of the lives of his people. M. S. Z. writes from Ohio, acknowledging answer to prayer for help in selling a farm. B. G. from a South Carolina town, for help in securing a position.

Good reports continue to come from the Prayer League of the Central Baptist Church of Memphis, Tenn. We have on hand a special article narrating the splendid work of this remarkable prayer center. The publication of this article has been unfortunately delayed, but it will soon appear in the columns of the Christian Herald.

Acknowledgments of answered prayers have also been received from:

Mrs. M. B., Topeka, Kan.; Mrs. G. C. D., Foley, Ala.; M., Topeka, Kan.; Mrs. A. L., Pawtucket, R. I.; Mrs. C. G. C., Sumatra, Mont.; M. B., Concord, Tenn. (for answers to special prayers); C. B. M., Hensel, Pa.; J. H., Highland Park, Mich.; M. E., Kittanning, Pa.; A Reader, Hodges, S. C. (for answer to two special prayers); E. Z., Blue Mound, Ill.; Mrs. M. H., Ulster, Pa.; Mrs. A. J. M., Rowland, N. C.; Subscriber's Wife, Oblong, Ill.; Mrs. M. A. S., Fort Johnson, N. Y.

E. Z. writes from Blue Mound, Ill.: "Dear Christian members, pray for my complete restoration. About a year ago I underwent a serious operation, and I lingered in the valley of the shadow of death, yet God mercifully gave me partial health. Yet oh, I long to be entirely well. Will not the dear praying people unite their prayers with mine, as I each day also pray for them, that God will take away this misery from my side, never again to return? I believe in God's power to heal, and oh, how I long to be well! Life means so much to me—please, dear praying people, will you not send a petition to the great Physician in my behalf?"

A subscriber's wife writes from Illinois: "Will you please ask the Prayer League pray that my dear mother and also a child may be restored to health. Also that five members of my family may become Christians, and that perfect love may reign in a union where now there is discord. Pray that I may live nearer to Jesus and have his great peace in my heart."

Mrs. R. E. Thompson, of Union, Mass., whose little son was kidnapped three years ago by her husband from whom she was separated, and who has a criminal record, writes: "My boy has been gone from me three years yesterday, and can now be hardly called a baby, but must be quite a boy. Will you please again ask the members of the Prayer League to pray for his return to me?"

A converted convict writes from Auburn Prison to ask prayer that he may be helped in beginning life anew on his release from the penitentiary.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at Westfield, Mass.; Green Ridge, Mo.; Oatesville, Pa.; Alden, Mich.; Colerain, Ohio or the spiritual upbuilding of Eastern Ohio, (each one may humbly do what God would like him to do); Pinewood, S. C.; Lebanon, Ohio; Mrs. E. M. G., Cincinnati, Ohio, requests prayer that a minister may get a pastorate.

Fourteen friends ask prayer for the mental restoration or strengthening of relative friends or themselves.

Six friends ask prayer for the restoration or strengthening of sight for themselves or other friends.

Thirty-seven friends ask prayer for deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Thirteen readers ask prayer that friends or relatives may be delivered from the liquor habit.

Thirteen parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons, eleven for the conversion of daughters and thirty-four readers ask prayer for the conversion of other relatives or friends.

Ten friends ask prayer for special spiritual blessing for relatives or friends.

Sixty friends ask prayer for the healing of relatives or friends, including one that a child may regain the use of limbs, another that a sister may be cured of stammering, and another that a sister's speech may be restored. Six friends ask prayer for the healing of self.

Nine readers ask prayer for the healing of hearing for themselves or friends.

Twenty-nine friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial affairs.

Thirty-eight friends ask prayer for the attainment of varied desires and needs.

Among the Workers

H. P. MIDKIFF, CASTRO, BRAZIL, writes: "We have never done anything in a direct way to influence the students to make any religious manifestation of any kind but have been open and perfectly frank, always speaking of Christianity as the most natural thing in the world and treating sin as a disorder. The result has been surprising. Fourteen Bibles have been bought by the students and they are being studied. One poor boy arranged the money (50 cents) and told the rest not to tell his Catholic grandmother about it. We want to continue this Christian atmosphere. Friday night we always have the students write compositions. Here is a sample written by a non-Christian boy: 'My Idea of a Good Home. A home really good is that one in which reigns the peace of God. One in which vice does not live, but there existing love between the various members. One where Christ is glorified and honored by all, where love reigns and all perform their duties. One where vanity does not predominate, neither pride nor laziness. One where there is a desire to serve God and one's neighbors.'"

THE PRESBYTERIAN Department of Missionary Education was dissolved June 15, 1915, it being the judgment that the work would be more efficiently promoted by the several boards, as follows: Board of Home Missions, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York City; Board of Foreign Missions, B. Carter Millikin, Educational Secretary; Rev. George H. Trull, Sunday School Secretary, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York City; Board of Missions for Freedmen, Rev. John M. Gaston, 513 Bessemer Bldg., Pittsburg, Pa.; Board of Publication and Sabbath School Work, Mr. J. M. Somerville, Witherspoon Building, Philadelphia; Woman's Board of Home Missions, Mrs. M. J. THE HARRINGTON and DIXON evangelist party has held a tabernacle campaign at Mrs. Donough, N. Y., with four churches attending. The crowds were fine, the interest deep, and God's Spirit markedly manifest in evangelistic service. Results are growing, and the community is being stirred.

IN 1877 Colonel and Mrs. George J. Clarke founded the Pacific Garden Mission in Chicago. Soon afterward they were instrumental in organizing the Congregational Church of the Open Door in Morgan Park, of which Colonel Clarke was a member until his death in 1892, and of which Mrs. Clarke is still a member. Through all these years the Clarke income has been used in maintaining the Pacific Garden Mission. The Church of the Open Door is now building a new needed edifice and the friends of the Clarke family are planning to put a memorial window in the new building to commemorate their long-continued interest in the saving of men.

ISABEL UDA DE ZAMORA, the widow of Pastor Nicolas Zamora, who died in September, 1914, is living in retirement at Bulakan, P. I., the family of five daughters and two sons.

EVANGELIST WALT HOLCOMB of Nashville, Tenn., has just closed a notable union mission at Red Springs, N. C.; 250 reclamations of man's conversions are claimed. Mr. Holcomb reports something like 3,000 reclamations during his meetings this year. About 1,500 conversions have joined the churches.

28: 18-20; II Cor. 5: 19; Phil. 2: 9-11; I Cor. 15: 24.

BELIEVERS and unbelievers agree that there is a frightful disparity between the pretensions of Christian hope and its present practice. Our record just now is little if any better, for our nation is furnishing a great share of the instruments and material for keeping up the war and fattening on the proceeds of it. Shall the work of evangelizing the world have to be begun all over again on a saner, more righteous, more spiritual basis? Must we begin to present more accurate models of Christianity here we can expect avowedly un-Christian nations to become Christian? Some months ago a prominent popular magazine published the story of a young Christian Chinese girl who came to America all aglow with delightful anticipations of visiting a Christian nation. Her experiences in America's metropolis were pitiful enough, yet her faith was so beautiful that she was not harmed. By the comparison of her dream of America with its facts showed how willy short we come of being a real Christian nation. Everybody's Magazine about the same time asked its readers to answer the question: "What is a Christian?" More than fifty thousand answers were received, from which the following was chosen as the best: "An actual Christian is one who in individual concerns sincerely tries to practice the Christian ideal, and in common affairs tries to convert the Christian ideal the social organism of which he is a part."

His definition, good as it is, hardly measures up to the evangelical standard. It must include something about a personal communion with the world's Christ, a personal affection for him, a supernatural experience of deliverance from the power of unworthy motives and the bestowal of divine grace to do right.

March your New Testament again for a view of that "highest standard of experience and life." In the light of this study read the passages assigned for consideration in today's lesson, which give glad assurances that the day is truly coming when the world shall have actually submitted itself to the ideals and the leadership of Jesus.

Be a Leader! Be a Follower!

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U.
Topic. I Sam. 14: 1-16; 18: 1-4
Led by the President

THE startling story narrating how Jonathan and his armor-bearer stole upon a great encampment of Philistines and set them to slaughtering one another, which was studied a few weeks ago in the Sunday school lesson, appears again as the subject for Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. today. We must utter another protest against the selection of these scenes of blood from Old Testament history for special study by children and young people under the auspices of the church.

In considering this lesson, then, do not dwell on the events themselves. Take simply the fact that Jonathan, who was himself a leader, was glad to become a follower of a man whom he loved and whom he considered greater and more efficient than himself.

These two instincts must both be cultivated and must be kept balanced—the instinct to follow and the instinct to lead. The world and the church have two kinds of difficulties in this matter: some people want to lead and teach before they are equipped for it; some others shrink from the responsibilities of leading and teaching for which they are really fitted. Diatrophes had the unenviable reputation of "loving to have the preeminence." He has had many successors. Many a cause is wrecked by people who rush forward to positions of leadership before they are ready.

Begin now to learn to balance carefully these two phases of life. In Sunday school work, in young people's society and other church work, he willing to learn and follow; assume modestly but bravely the responsibilities of teaching and guiding as they are presented. Above all, follow the sublime Leader, who shows us how to live and how to help. As we submit our lives fully to him he will equip us for efficient careers of guiding others and teaching them the ways of brotherhood, piety, and heavenly hope.

Do You Know Your Bible?

The Letters of St. Paul

A. Questions. All-Year Contest List 7.
Half-Year Contest List 2.

Colossians

PHILEMON, Colossians, Ephesians and Philippians are called the "Prison Epistles." Most Bible scholars hold that they were all written at Rome, but some leading critics believe that the first three, and some, even all four, were written from Caesarea during Paul's long imprisonment there. (Acts 24: 27.)

What expression in the epistle to the Colossians shows that Paul was a prisoner while writing it?

a. What expression indicates that Paul had not been to Colosse? b. To what other church was a letter sent at the same time with the plan that each church should read both letters? c. What other neighboring town is mentioned? (The three towns were situated in the valley of the Lycus, on an important trade route.)

a. What companion of Paul's was deeply interested in the spiritual welfare of the Christians at three of these cities? b. What verse states that he had instructed the Colossian Christians? c. Omission of a small word in the Revised Version indicates that he was indeed the founder of the church there.

a. What two friends of Paul carried this letter to the Colossians? b. What five other friends of Paul sent greetings?

a. What expressions indicate that Paul wrote the Colossian Christians to be exposed to false teachings? b. What false sort of worship had evidently been taught? Later Christian writers indicate that the Lycus valley continued to the scene of philosophic speculation and that at Colosse and its successor, Chonae, now called Chonass, the same sort of worship referred to here was persisted in.

Note: To understand correctly the message of this epistle it is necessary to read the Revised rendering of 2: 23. This verse, linked with 2: 16, 17, forms the key to the epistle, yet its meaning is hopelessly obscured in the Authorized Version. The American Version is as follows: "Which things have indeed a show of wisdom in will worship and humility, and severity to the body, but are not of any value against the indulgence of the flesh." Aside from their temptation to false worship, the Colossians were evidently being harassed by Jewish Christians, who taught that although circumcision and submission to the ceremonial law might not be essential to salvation, yet if the Gentile Christians would submit to these requirements they would attain a higher spiritual perfection and a more complete mastery over the flesh. Now let us see Paul's arguments against this teaching.

6. What verses in the first and second chapters state the absolute supremacy and all-sufficiency of Christ?

7. a. Besides reconciling them to the Father, what was the purpose as related to them of Christ's death? b. Find all the verses, some already referred to, which refer to the believer's union with Christ in his death, or resurrection, or both.

8. a. Where is the believer's completeness? b. What conditions must be met in order that the believer may receive personally the benefits of Christ's death and resurrection?

9. What terms does Paul use to signify the sinful nature which is to be put off and the new nature which is received when the believer by faith joins himself to Christ?

10. a. What does Paul declare to be the bond of perfectness? b. If possible use language of Revised Version here. c. Referring again to the prayer of Paul's companion for the Colossians, what was it that he longed for?

Black and White Sheep

IN Emporia, Kansas, a busy pastor, the Rev. J. H. J. Rice, of the First Congregational, includes the law-breakers of the town as a distinct part of his parish. For not only is Mr. Rice a pastor but he is also judge of the city's police court. Mr. Rice was appointed to take charge of the city court a year and a half ago. Since that time, no appeals to higher courts have been made from his decisions. And only three men have been brought before him more than once.

"I feel that curing crime is more important than punishing crime," Mr. Rice explains. "But it is absolutely essential that lawbreakers must be taught respect for the law."

Mr. Rice is 62 years old, tall and kindly faced. Through years of service for Christianity, he has become possessed of a judicial temperament. By his decisions he has proven himself practical. His attitude toward the prisoners who are brought before him is one of helpfulness, carried out both in words and deeds.

The office of the police judge in the Emporia city hall was a bare walled, dirty floored, unpleasant room. Mr. Rice spent his first month's salary as police judge in renovations. Judge Rice's court is a conference room, not an amusement place for loafers attracted by curiosity. The prisoners tell their stories in their own way and are not harried by lawyers.

"It is just as easy to get justice without a lawyer as with one, in most of the minor cases that come before me," the parson-judge declares. The city prosecutor has been encouraged to act as much as possible as an attorney for both sides. The result has been that so far only six lawyers besides the prosecuting attorney have appeared to defend prisoners.

The first prisoner to be brought before Judge Rice was a notorious crap-shooter, who viewed the new judge with open suspicion. There was defiance in the prisoner's attitude. A half hour later "George" left the court room in a different mood.

During his "session" the crap-shooter, who had been fined many times, was disabused of the idea that the court was his enemy. Instead of "soaking" the prisoner, the judge, following the instincts of the preacher, asked the man to tell about himself.

That was the opening wedge. Since then, the prisoner and the judge have become good friends; and "George" has not been arrested again. He has had plenty of work.

Other changes have come about. The police have been instructed to make arrests only when absolutely necessary. They are urged to use preventive and educational methods instead of penal.

The Dual Shepherd

No special attempt is made to revenue from the court.

By a system of paroles, Mr. Rice is able to keep in touch with men who need help. His monthly salary of $45 from the city is deposited as a special account to help the families of the men who come before him. Last year there was a shortage of work in Emporia. Mr. Rice took the matter to his wealthy congregation. He announced that if persons who had trees on their property would cut them, he would send men to cut and haul the wood for fuel. As police judge, Rice made arrangements with the men who did the work, or to those who would buy the wood. The result went to the workers and a "labor problem" in Emporia was solved.

Mr. Rice is emphatic in his declaration that he is only doing his duty. His theory in regard to his church is that it is his opportunity to serve the community. Mr. Rice holds that the church is an instrument of righteousness which should not demand the services of its pastor.

As police judge, Mr. Rice has used his influence successfully to persuade a number of lawbreakers to form a habit of church-going; explaining the church influence is certain to aid in reformation. When he first took office, Mr. Rice had the courage to ask newspaper reporters to leave the court news alone, excepting cases of unusual interest. He protects the out of print.

"It gives them a new chance," he explains.

The Garden on the Hill By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

LITTLE Stephan Leichnam, a twelve-year-old Cincinnati school-boy, wanted a garden. And because he wanted this garden very, very much, his little heart was filled with a deep sorrow. For he had no spot in which to plant his seeds—he had no ground in which a conventional garden could flourish.

True, Stephan had a home, but the home—in the utterly irresponsible manner of some homes—was set precariously on the side of a hill. The hill was so steep that when it rained, large portions of it had a truly awful habit of sliding down muddily onto the Leichnam kitchen steps.

It is no easy matter to make a garden on a steep hillside, especially if the surface of said hillside has a horrible habit of sliding away. Stephan nearly cried, I fancy, as he got a mental picture of thriving plants washed away by the rain, of sprouting seeds tobogganing down through the mud to his kitchen steps.

Boys who are all of twelve years old seldom cry. Oh, yes—they want to at times (who doesn't?), but they don't do it. Usually they snifle hard and dig their grimy little fingers deep into the mysterious recesses of some dark pocket and say gruffly—

"Aw—I don't care."

Stephan Leichnam probably had the grimy fingers and the mysterious pockets to put them in, but, though I don't know him (I wish that I did!) I'm rather sure that he said:

"I do care!"

And his caring enough was the very thing that made his garden grow.

First of all came the great question, "How?" For gardens don't usually grow on hillsides. Because Stephan was a clever little boy he evolved a plan that was very ingenious and successful, a plan that probably sounds easier than it is.

STEPHAN has made his garden by terracing the hillside. Because there are evidently a great many rocks in Cincinnati he has built up the sides of the terrace with the ones he has extracted from the hill, thereby making a firm foundation that the rain would not wash away, and also removing all hard substances from the soft rich dirt that he wanted to plant his crops in. Looking up from below, the hillside is reminiscent of a rocky mountain slope with little or no vegetation on it; but on looking down you see a strip of garden three feet wide crowning each terrace. On each of these terraces he raises a different vegetable; beans, cabbages, beets, lettuce, and corn being the most important.

School children and school authorities in Cincinnati are saying that Stephan will probably win a prize with his garden—for it is a very productive as well as a very unique garden. All of which is very fine, for prizes are grand things when one is a twelve-year-old boy. But, whether or not Stephan wins official recognition, he has already become the possessor of a prize. For he has made a garden against very grave odds. He has played a game and won it, and he has strengthened his character in the playing of the game.

I KNEW two business girls who were out of work. They were efficient girls and clever girls, furthermore, they knew their line of business thoroughly. But they were both out of work.

Finally there came news of an opening in a certain very wonderful firm. It was the kind of a position that is open only once in a lifetime for some girls, and both of my friends realized it.

I met one girl at the station the morning after I first heard of the opening. She was a slim, very charming young lady, with appealing eyes and a sweet smile. Because I knew her very well I spoke without formality.

"Are you going to apply for the position?" I questioned. "Do you think that you'll get it?"

The girl raised her appealing eyes to mine. "Yes, I'm going to apply," she told me. "oh, I hope that I shall get it."

Later in the day I met the second girl on the street. She was not as well dressed as the other girl, but though her shoes were shabby, there was a something in her eyes. . . .

"Will you try for the big position?" I asked as I had asked once before. "Do you think you'll get it?"

The girl squared her chin and she looked rather tight. Quite frankly her eyes met mine.

"I'll get it," she told me. "I get it if it's possible, you see!"

A week later the second girl had the position.

"Why," I asked the first girl—the one of the appealing eyes—a few months later when she was ensconced in a comfortable little position with no opportunities—"why didn't you take that big job?"

The girl laughed, a little wistfully. "There was a certain part of the work," she told me, "that I knew nothing about. So, of course, I had to give up all idea of it!" We let the matter rest.

Not long afterward I met the second girl. She looked pretty, and radiant, and—prosperous.

"How," I asked her, "did you manage to know that part of the work that Julia couldn't do?"

"Why," she told me, "I didn't know any more about it than she did. But when they asked me if I could do it I said that I would. Then I took my money (my last cent) out of the bank and took lessons at a business college at night. It wasn't easy to do, but it paid."

Oh, friends of mine, perhaps our lines lie in pleasant places. Perhaps the world of worry and work and striving is far from your door. But, in perspective, you have a garden to plant on a back out of the planting because our garden spot is on the steep side of a hill! Remember that every time you plan is strengthening your individuality, and every heavy stone that you lift from the ground is not just making a foundation for your garden to stand on. It's making a foundation of character that your life will stand on.

Libby's Milk

Until you have tried Libby's Milk it is really hard to realize the disadvantages of the old fashioned way of buying milk in bottles. After you have tried Libby's you will wonder how you ever got along without it.

Libby's Milk is pure, rich milk from modern, sanitary dairies made more than twice as rich by a simple, scientific method of evaporation—then sterilized and packed in hermetically sealed cans.

Buy it by the can, the dozen or the case—it will keep indefinitely until it is opened and much longer than bottled milk after it is opened. Use it thick and rich just as it comes from the can for every purpose for which you would ordinarily use cream or add an equal quantity of water for drinking or when your recipe calls for milk. In addition to its other advantages the use of Libby's Milk means a decided economy. Try it for a week—this week—and see.

WHO'S THAT?

POSSIBLY ordinary soap would clean the refrigerator and the pantry as well as Ivory Soap. But here the particular housekeeper aims at something more than the mere absence of dirt.

She desires that these things be really, purely clean, in the sense that Ivory Soap is clean. That is why Ivory is used for so many purposes where, at first thought, ordinary soap seems good enough.

NO spot ever can rival Jerusalem in interest to believers in the Bible, for with it are associated the things most sacred to them. Its story never grows old, for each new generation would learn all that has already been told about Zion, Beautiful Zion, City of our Lord. And whenever, as has often happened, that city has a place in the great events of the day, all of Christendom and all of Jewry turn their eyes toward Jerusalem in apprehension lest something of its sacredness be lost. Just why Palestine should figure in the present war is not quite clear; but the clouds of battle appear to be floating toward Jerusalem, and it may be that ere long War will strike its unholy hands at the gates thereof.

WHAT a city is this that we have come to! Its very age is overwhelming, antedating by half a century the hanging gardens of Babylon; older than the eternal city of Rome by seven hundred years; in fact, it was a youth when Athens was born.

These walls, so many times destroyed, so many times rebuilt; the city which has been so many times a heap of stones, and is now but a remnant of its former glory, has you with magic power. Out from the dimness of the past steal so many spirits that all the city seems crowded with shadowy forms. The prophets of old David and his warriors, Solomon with his magnificence, the princes of Judah with their abominations, the armies of the invading Assyrians, Chaldeans, Romans; and then the figure of the Son of God, who walked these streets and, standing on yonder hillside, wept over the sinning city.

Going about one cannot but feel that the landmarks are extremely uncertain and that all statements must be taken with great reserve. There are a few places unquestioned. Of course, among these is the site of the temple, the Mount of Olives, Mount Zion, and the valleys of Hinnom and Jehoshaphat.

The surrounding country still exhibits something of a general aspect, but the blight is on it. The rich and profuse vegetation which covered these rolling hills is no more. With the misfortune of centuries the trees have been cut down, and none planted in their places; the soil has been washed from the hillsides, and only a trace of the former beauty can be seen.

When you pass within the Jaffa Gate you remember the words, "My feet shall stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem." The clamor of the venders of cauldrons along the wall by the Tower of David, the picturesque costumes, and the novel methods of the Orient distract you for the moment, but they return to you for all time.

The streets are narrow and crooked; there are no streets that can be termed avenues. David Street, Zion Street and the Via Dolorosa are the principal thoroughfares. The latter is so crooked and narrow and so frequently crooked that it seems like a crooked path more than a street. The rest of the city is so befuddling that no one seems to have been in the minds of the builders. Dr. Tuttle says, "I can never tell you where I am in a street or where some one's back is."

The Christian quarter outside the walls is quite modern, and is fairly well built. Large convents and churches, schools, houses and dwellings line the narrow streets and present only small barred windows to the passer-by. The other quarters show less regard for regularity, and the bazaars are like all Eastern shops, very much dilapidated and shabby. There is no air of business, but a lazy stillness, a sort of dogged obstinacy expressed in the faces of the merchants, these "sons of eternity."

YOU will turn your face toward the Temple Area perhaps first of all. The temple is no more, and where it stood now stands the Mosque of Omar, which is in the mind of the Mohammedan next in importance to that at Mecca. One cannot say enough of its beauty, for it is the best-preserved specimen of Arabic architecture which you are apt to see. It is covered with richly colored porcelain tiles, and the frieze is ornamented with texts from the Koran. It may not seem so large as one had expected, but that little disappointment is removed as one gets near to it and sees the exquisite coloring.

Having removed your shoes, or subjected yourself to having rather ungainly sandals tied on over your shoes, you are admitted to the mosque. Within it is rather dark, as the light comes through stained-glass windows which are made on the plan of mosaics. The result is unquestionably rich and impressive. There are two rows of pillars, the inner one being the support of the great dome which covers the rocky top of Mount Moriah, which is allowed to stick up through the floor in all its roughness.

Here Abraham is supposed to have builded his altar for the sacrifice of Isaac. Here the Temple of Solomon stood and the Mohammedans say that the prophet Mohammed on his horse El Burak ascended up to heaven from here, and that the rock started to follow him, but was held down by the hand of the angel Gabriel. They will even show you the indentation in the rock made by the fingers of the angel.

After you have seen Omar you will want to walk down the Via Dolorosa to the Church of the Holy Sepulcher, which the Roman, Greek and Armenian Catholics believe covers the garden tomb and Calvary. Outside it presents that rough appearance so characteristic of the East, while within it shows gorgeous decorations. It seems rather small when you try to comprehend the number of sacred places which tradition endeavors to include within its walls.

I am somewhat skeptical. It is pathetic to see devout pilgrims weep and kiss, over and over again, the stones of this structure, which enshrines their profoundest faith.

Here you are shown the spot where God took the dust from the earth and with it mingled Deity, thus creating Adam. Then on the top of the rock which is supposed to be Calvary you are shown indentations in the rock made by the falling tears of Mary. Here also you see the holes in the rock where the crosses stood (but I doubt if crosses could have stood in such shallow holes), and close beside them a little crack nicely chiseled which they tell you was caused by the earthquake which accompanied the crucifixion.

LET us leave the confines of the city walls and "go round about Jerusalem, and tell the towers thereof."

Let us start down there by the tomb of Absalom in the valley of the Kidron, or the valley of Jehoshaphat. Why do the orthodox Jews throw stones or spit upon that tomb? To show their hatred for a child who shows such disrespect for his parents as did Absalom.

Now let us climb up that steep bank and start around the wall. First there is St. Stephen's Gate, or the Sheep Gate, through which the lambs for the temple sacrifices were brought, and near to which Stephen was stoned. As we pass along we notice that here is a gate all walled up. This is the "Beautiful Gate" at which the lame man sat to whom Peter said, "Silver and gold have I none, but such as I have give I unto thee." This is the gate through which Jesus rode into Jerusalem the day he was received with Hosannas; and now the Mohammedans have closed it, believing that the next time a Christian comes through it Islam will fall and the end of the world will come.

Just a bit farther along this eastern wall you are attracted by a stone shaped like a tree trunk sticking out of the wall close to the top. This is none other than the judgment seat of Mohammed. Here the great prophet is to sit in judgment. From this point to the top of Olivet a hair is to be stretched, some say; others that a sword-blade as thin as a hair; at any rate, each individual must perform the gymnastic feat of walking across to prove his faithfulness to Mohammed and his cause. If you have been true to him you will have angelic help; if not, you will fall to destruction in the valley of Jehoshaphat.

Inside the "Golden Gate." Walled Up in Belief That When Again Opened the Turks Will Lose Jerusalem

Around to the south you come to the valley of Hinnom, and about midway the stench arising from rotting refuse will make you hasten your steps. This is Gehenna indeed. You soon mount up to the southwest corner of the city, and here you are standing on Mount Zion. So passing to the west you dip down into the valley of Gihon, with its upper and lower pools of Gihon, and are soon at the Jaffa Gate, the chief entrance for trade and for pilgrims. Around to the north is the Damascus Gate, the chief entrance for pomp and honor.

ONE walks about the walls and descends into the valleys or climbs the hills with ever fresh delight. The views are beautiful and the associations less disturbed by modern changes and baseless traditions. To walk about the places one has been familiar with since childhood, such as the Pool of Siloam, the Garden of Gethsemane, the Mount of Olives, and Calvary, greatly ministers to faith and devotion. These hills and valleys are radiant with the footprints of the Son of Man.

We pass down the road toward Bethany, our objective point being Gethsemane. Huddled along the wall in the sunlight are a half dozen lepers, poor creatures who have lost all the sunlight out of their lives for all time. Would that Jesus could have walked with us in person that day! We are certain he would have stopped and laid his hand upon them, giving them newness of life.

Very few places in all the Holy Land are so dear to Gethsemane and Mount of Olives from Site of Solomon's Temple

the Christian as is Gethsemane. Here the Saviour struggled with the tremendous burden of the world's sin laid upon him. The enclosure is nearly square and is surrounded by a limestone wall about ten feet high. We rapped long and loud at the door, and finally were admitted by a monk, who showed us around among the olive trees and the flower beds. Around the walls are the "stations of the cross" and other symbols of the suffering which are dear to every Catholic.

The olive trees are gnarled and twisted, and though they have every appearance of being very old we can hardly accept the statement that under yonder tree Jesus knelt in prayer on the night that Judas so easily betrayed him.

FROM Gethsemane you will want to retrace your steps to Calvary, for one is the complement of the other. The new site of Calvary is an elevation just beyond the Damascus Gate. In the days of Christ it was the place of stoning. It is shaped like a skull and is the only hill outside the walls having the appearance of Golgotha.

Mr. Fisher Howe, of Brooklyn, N. Y., first drew attention to this site. I am informed, in a little pamphlet entitled "The True Site of Calvary." Later General Gordon of England, better known as Chinese Gordon, or Gordon of Khartum, having studied it carefully, adopted this identification, and today it bears his name; that is, it is called Gordon's Calvary.

It may or may not be the true site of Calvary, but it has more of the earmarks of credibility about it than has the other site. What matters it whether be the place or not? Perhaps it were better that we did not know the exact spots. The spirit of the Gospel tends to withdraw men's minds from an attachment to places and lead them to worship God "in spirit and in truth."

"Land of fair Palestine, where Jesus trod, Thy ruins and thy relics tell of God;
Thine everlasting hills with awe proclaim
The holy record of Jehovah's name;
Thy fallen cities, crumbled into dust, Pronounce the judgments of Jehovah just."

Taking the College to the Farmer

By LOUIS E. ORCUTT

How the Extension Work of the Agricultural Colleges Is Succeeding under Federal Support and Supervision

THE leadership of America is nowhere so unquestioned as in the field of popular education. We have no Jena, no Leipzig, no Vienna; but we have the "little red schoolhouse," the graded school, the high school and the great state universities and schools of agriculture. Perhaps the most inspired of all our educational projects was the land grant college provided for by the Morrill Act of 1862. Under this act each state was given a liberal grant of public lands as an endowment for a college of agriculture and the mechanic arts. No other educational institutions have so deeply impressed themselves upon our national life or rendered to the nation at large such practical service. Now these colleges are given the direction of the "greatest single educational enterprise that any government has yet undertaken," an enterprise for which Uncle Sam has authorized the expenditure of more than forty millions of dollars to be expended by 1923. Four and one-half more millions will be expended in each succeeding year until the act is amended or repealed.

On May 8, 1914, the President approved the Smith-Lever Bill, which by its title was intended "To aid in diffusing among the people of the United States useful and practical information on subjects relating to agriculture and home economics, and to encourage the application of the same." The bill appropriated $480,000, $10,000 to each of the forty-eight states, to be paid annually to each state which would plan to use it in conformity with the purpose of the act. This fund was to be increased by an additional $600,000 the second year and by $500,000 more each succeeding year until the annual appropriation reached a total of $4,100,000 in addition to the original $480,000. This fund was to be divided among the states, which would raise an equal amount to be expended in the same connection, in proportion to the percentage that their rural populations bore to the whole rural population of the country. The work was to be carried on by the agricultural colleges under the supervision of the Department of Agriculture at Washington.

The Morrill Act contemplated the taking of agriculture out of the class of things depending upon chance and the placing of it among the applied sciences. The colleges established under the act were not, at first, taken very seriously by the men on the farm. Had not their fathers passed on to them the accumulated wisdom of the generations that had gone before? Was not the soil of the great prairie states inexhaustible? What could a mere professor in a college tell a practical farmer about his business? That was a perfectly natural position for the farmers to take and the colleges accepted the challenge and proved their case.

THE young men who went back to the farms from the colleges were better farmers because of their scientific knowledge. They took prize at county fairs and raised crops when their neighbors failed. Gradually the communities began to believe in the schools, and the sons of the farm crowded their halls, while their bulletins were eagerly read by an ever widening constituency. Notwithstanding the growing enrolments in Agronomy, in Animal Husbandry, in Dairying and in Home Economics; notwithstanding the doubling many times since 1862 of the state and national appropriations; notwithstanding the great scientific plants that grew out of the colleges and from which the results of research and experiment were given out in frequent bulletins, the fact was forced on the colleges that they were not reaching their field adequately. While they were doing all they could with the facilities at their command, the colleges were not really meeting the agricultural needs of their states. The reason was that each of them, being in one place, could not be conversant with the facts regarding all the conditions of all the other places in the state. This handicap had been met in some degree by getting in touch with the more enterprising farmers in different sections of the states and establishing demonstration and experimental plots on their farms, to be visited occasionally by college experts; by securing reports about crop conditions and crop questions from correspondents; by frequent lecture trips of professors to meetings of county granges and other farmers' organizations; and by sending back to the farms each year a certain number of graduates. But in all these methods the scientific plant and the experimental work of the college remained in the college town, and the advantage to the state as a whole, while great, nevertheless limited and not evenly distributed. The professors in charge of exhibits at the state fair noticed that these exhibits drew constantly increasing crowds, that the lectures were given to crowded benches, and at last some professor asked, "Why not arrange a short course of ten days or two weeks at the college and make it so non-technical that the practical man can grasp its lessons and act upon its conclusions?"

The question was answered in the "short courses of the colleges," held during the winter vacations. The usual "short course" offered instruction in stock judging—the most important subject of all to many farmers who must feed their corn to stock for market to realize a profit on it—in crop rotation, in soil chemistry, in fertilizing and fertilizers, in fruit-growing and in the adaptation of crops to soils and of improved machinery to both. There were courses in butter and cheese making, in the care of dairy animals and in their economics, and the whole mechanical and experimental plant of the college was open to the short-course students, with graduate and undergraduate students on hand to explain each machine and process in practical terms and to relate it to the operation of the farm. From all over the states men and women and young men and maidens flocked to the colleges and spent ten or a dozen days in earnest hard work. Many an old farmer left the college with a new light of purpose in his eye and a new grip upon problems that had baffled him; and many a young man and woman came back again to enter for the full four years' course.

EVEN yet the college was not reaching all the people who were eager to hear what it had to say. There were still many who could not get to the college short course or to the state fair, and letters were constantly being received asking the college to furnish a practical demonstration of some part of its work at some county fair or convention. Arrangements were made to take to these fairs and conventions miniature laboratories or small demonstration units, with students to explain them and an instructor to superintend the exhibit and to give lectures. "Corn trains" and other trains, equipped to demonstrate particular elements of the crop problem and to suggest action for the betterment of conditions, did a great deal, wherever they went, to develop a general interest in practical science and to increase crop yields. Still, not enough was being done. There was the boy problem and the girl problem, the without-farm problem, the problem of poor fertilizing, the problem of the right crop for a particular soil. Bulletins and occasional addresses could help; but it was felt that the intimate personal touch was needed. This came through the extension work and the local short courses, a branch of college activity that was begun by Cornell University about fifteen years ago and in which thirty-three colleges were engaged by 1910.

The local short courses were patterned after the course given at the college and were built upon the experience gained in the state fair exhibits and in demonstration trains and lecture trips. The college sent a choice selection of its experimental equipment, at the choicest of its human equipment and its human labor, to the county-seat town or the place where the course was to be held. The course was well advertised and the students that closed the year's work of the boys' corn clubs and the girls' canning clubs were arranged for the same time and place. There were also prizes for the best of farm products, competitive exhibits of the products of the field, the orchard, of the poultry yard and of the kitchen, so that the "short course" really amounted to a miniature county fair. It is only necessary to see one of these "short courses" to realize the interest in scientific agriculture that now permeates every farming community. No matter how late the building engaged for the course, it is crowded every day. The lectures and motion pictures and scientific talks are given to capacity audiences, the experimental laboratories are kept busy analyzing soils and recommending proper treatments. The awarding of the prizes in the corn and canning clubs is always a "big time," and every "short course" brings new recruits to the college.

The colleges found it possible, through their extension departments, to encourage the founding of the boys' corn clubs and the girls' canning clubs until very few rural communities are now without one or the other contest at the close of the season. Each boy in a corn club plants an acre of ground to corn, usually an acre on his father's farm. He does all the work himself from the first preparation of the ground, grade, and the one adjudged the best gets a suitable prize. Often the first prize in both cases is a scholarship for a year at the agricultural college, and many of the best farmers and the leading professors today are men who first became vitally interested in agriculture through one of these contests.

The extension work of the colleges, with its short courses and boys' and girls' clubs and crop advice and general desire to be of service to the state at large, soon developed a need for closer personal direction of the local work, and the county agent of the extension division was the result. The county agent is a technically trained man, who has his headquarters at the county seat and who is always available to search for the cause of trouble, to investigate new problems, to prescribe for new disorders and for the constantly recurring old ones, and to organize and direct the work of the boys' and girls' clubs and arrange for their competitions and contests. The usual arrangement provides that the county take care of a part of his salary and the college will pay the balance.

The activities of the county agent of Merriam County, Nebraska, are representative of them all. In ten months he visited 543 farms, answered 2,000 telephone calls, saw 478 visitors, wrote 779 letters and received 191, traveled 9,040 miles by automobile and 1,335 by train, held 22 meetings with a total attendance of 1,800 people, organized two boys' corn clubs, vaccinated 2,069 hogs (4,570 more were vaccinated as a result of his work), saving 82 per cent. of infected herds and 97 per cent. in well herds in infected districts, tested 352 cows, bought 34 animals, and conducted 74 crop demonstrations and 28 other demonstrations. He was a busy man. Multiply his work and results by 1,000 and you will have an approximate idea of the results of the work of the more than one thousand county agents now at work. If a man is having trouble with a certain field a call brings the county agent. If the agent is not sure as to the soil conditions, a test is made. If necessary, a full report goes to the expert at the college. If a new disease attacks a growing crop, the county agent knows of it at once and sees that proper preventive and curative agents are employed. His work means dollars and cents to the farmers of the county and it brings every success and every failure into prompt connection with the proper department at the college. In a state thoroughly organized, the vital experience of every section of the state is available at once for the benefit of every other section, and the college acts as the clearing-house through its Division of Agricultural Extension. This division is organized now in every Agricultural college in the United States, and any tiller of the soil, any orchardist or stock raiser who wants information can get it promptly by addressing the Division of Agricultural Extension of the College of Agriculture of his state.

THE extension work also includes the appointment of county women agents, who supervise and encourage the girls' canning clubs and conduct home economic demonstrations. The problems presented to the woman agent include children's welfare, selection, preservation and preparation of food, canning of fruit and vegetables on the farm, the selection and protection of water supply, sewage disposal, house ventilation, household equipment and management, use of labor-saving devices and the control of insects and pests. The woman agent need not lack for things to do. Her work trains girls to become efficient home-makers, to develop the resources of the farm, to improve the quality of country life and to become economically independent. What the girl learns, her mother is not slow to copy. Possibly the greatest field of all for the extension work lies in home economics. The immediate adoption of kitchen cabinets, separators, modern improved churns, meat-grinders, bread-mixers, washing-machines and vacuum cleaners shows that there is no greater field today for the invention of labor-saving devices than the home, and no home where they will be accorded a heartier welcome than they will receive on the farm.

The work of the agricultural extension short courses and county agents yielded such definite results in better methods and in bigger yields that the action of Congress in appropriating money for the development and extension of the work was almost inevitable. The results have so far exceeded in value the money expended that we may be certain that the sowing of these dollars will yield a great increase in the stability and returns of agriculture.

A Week in the World's News

The War in Europe By ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to L'Indépendance Belge.

THERE has perhaps not been a week since the first of January last in which events, both political and military, of great importance have succeeded each other with more startling rapidity than in the seven days ending September 23.

The most important event was the mobilization of the Bulgarian army for the ostensible purpose of maintaining the neutrality of that country.

The Balkans, almost since the very day the war began, have been a center of interest, and the probable military action of the several small states comprised in that area has been the subject of an enormous amount of conjecture and speculation. Few people, particularly in America, have a clear idea of the relations of the Balkan States to each other, or of their fears, hopes and ambitions, or of the policy of these countries in regard to each other and in regard to the rest of Europe.

In the area designated by the geographical expression the Balkans, there have been since 1878 four independent states, Montenegro, Serbia, Rumania and Bulgaria. Of late years, owing to community of problems and interests, it has been customary mentally to include Greece in the term Balkan States.

At one time or another and comparatively recently, these five states formed part of the Turkish Empire, from which they became separated by treaty or by war, and all are more or less hostile to Turkey to this day, though of late a large degree of this dislike of Turkey has been superseded by hatred of each other. By race, these countries are antagonistic, the Greeks claiming to be the descendants of the Greeks of the golden age, and proud in proportion to this descent, the Rumanians claiming to be the modern representatives of the Roman Empire, and also filled with the idea of the greatness of their ancestry. As a result, both these peoples are convinced that they, the Greeks and Rumanians of today, are called to play a part in the modern world analogous to that played in the ancient world by their ancestors. The Bulgarians and Serbians, though both of Slav origin originally, are as different from each other as the Germans and English, who also probably spring from an originally common stock. The only bond of union between the five states under consideration is that the Church in all is of the Oriental type of Christianity.

The great cause of friction has been the ambition of each of the four larger states to be the controlling power and practically to govern the others. In 1912 the common irritation against Turkey caused Greece, Serbia and Bulgaria to form a league which attacked Turkey and which, being completely victorious, forced that power to surrender to them all but ten thousand or so square miles of territory in Europe.

Over the division of this territory dissensions arose among the members of the league, which culminated in two members thereof, Serbia and Greece, attacking the third, Bulgaria. While Bulgaria was making every effort to defend herself against these two attacks on her southern and western fronts, Rumania suddenly and almost without warning attacked her northern frontier, with the result that Bulgaria, overwhelmed by the number of her enemies, gave up the fight and threw herself on the mercy of her conquerors. This quality, however, did not exist to any great degree, and as a consequence the three stripped Bulgaria of by far the greater portion of her share of the spoils of the campaign against Turkey as well as of some territory of hers before the war, and in so doing created the causes for the tempest which is apparently about to break today. Rumania took the northern province of Silistria, fronting on the Black Sea, whose inhabitants were pure Bulgar. Serbia and Greece divided Macedonia between them.

Now, the possession of Macedonia (populated almost entirely by Bulgars allied to their brethren in Bulgaria) by any other power than herself has been for two generations a source of bitter regret to Bulgaria, and her exasperation at seeing Macedonia, after she had freed it from Turkish rule, snatched from her by this combination of her former allies was extreme.

Since the war broke out all her negotiations with the Allies, who sought to reconstitute the Balkan League and add Rumania thereto, to hurl it against the Austrians and Turks, have had as a condition precedent the return to her of Macedonia. This apparently the Allies have not been able to persuade Serbia and Greece to do; the matter of Silistria might have been arranged.

While these negotiations, which have spread over a year, nearly, were going on, through German influences certain outstanding difficulties between Bulgaria and Turkey were arranged to Bulgaria's satisfaction, and one thing leading to another Bulgaria, in reply to a diplomatic communiqué whose form verged on that of an ultimatum, recently made to her by the Entente powers, on Wednesday, September 22nd, mobilized her entire army and proclaimed to the world that in accordance with the terms of a recently arranged agreement with Turkey she has assumed an attitude of armed neutrality. This, of course, is a mere phrase, a by the time these lines reach my readers is as certain as is humanly possible for an unhappened thing to be, that Bulgaria will be at war with all the Entente powers, probably with Greece, and possibly with Rumania.

Greece is greatly to be sympathized with. She does not want war, and has made every possible effort in the last three months to avoid it; but the inexorable course of events seems to be hurrying her toward a combat in which she risks much and stands to gain little.

Rumania's position is a difficult one. If she moves adversely to Bulgaria, her northern frontiers will immediately be attacked by the large Austro-German army which has been concentrated for some weeks at the point where her frontier joins that of Serbia, and she will be obliged to conduct a campaign against superior forces on two frontiers. Very possibly some arrangement has been or will be made by which she will remain quiet, for a territorial reward.

Bulgaria can put in the field a completely equipped, well-trained and to a very considerable extent war-hardened army of 320,000 men, well supplied with modern artillery. Behind this will be about 350,000 reserves of high military value. To this army must be added from eight to ten Turkish army corps which will be sent into Bulgaria so that the united fighting force will run to from 500,000 to 650,000.

The Bulgarian attack will probably be the first directed against southern Serbia, and Serbia will not be able to oppose this attack with any very large force, because her army has been greatly reduced, and she will at the same time

SOMEBODY ERRED—SEVEN DIE. Subways are necessary to the life of New York City. The use of the streets is also necessary.

As a result of these two necessities, the building of subways under the streets of New York has resulted in the adoption of a complicated system of cribbing and shoring by which the streets are supported and traffic continues while the excavation is made beneath and the subway structure completed. At the present time there are several miles of New York streets supported by these temporary structures. On account of frequent changing of members, weight and pressure are depended upon to hold the underpinning in place. On the morning of September 22, during the rush hour when the street was crowded with traffic, a dynamite blast in the side of the excavation for the Seventh Avenue subway between Twenty-fourth and Twenty-fifth streets, dislodged some of the supports of the streets, and the structure collapsed from Twenty-fifth almost to Twenty-third streets, taking down with it a crowded surface car, a few pedestrians and a brewery truck. Gas and water mains were burst, and both flood and fire added to the confusion. Firemen were soon on the scene with scaling ladders, and firemen and policemen with volunteer support from citizens went to work at once to remove the dead and injured. The third floor of the National Suit and Cloak Company's building, just east of Seventh Avenue and Twenty-fourth street, became a temporary hospital. Seven persons are known to be dead, and eighty-five were injured more or less seriously. The accident should not have been; somebody erred, who, has not yet been established.

AMERICAN INVASION OF INDIA. A contemporary, "The Nation's Business," speaking of British India as a market for American goods, states that an interesting development of the increased construction of large buildings in India has been the ever expanding use of American reinforcing steel and roofing materials. Road-making materials and machinery of American make stand high in popularity. "There is no branch of trade in India," says the article, "in which American manufacturers have made more increasing progress in recent years than in motor cars. During the year 1913-14, Great Britain supplied automobiles to the value of more than $2,000,000, the United States nearly $700,000, and all other countries following far in the rear. American agricultural motor-driven cars are in particular favor."

BURNING UP OUR NAVY. But a short time ago the old frigate Portsmouth, which had been consigned by the government to the junk-heap and was reported as having caught fire during the parade in Boston Harbor in honor of the visiting governors, was later burned and sunk at her dock; and now the oldest ship in the United States navy, the frigate Independence, recently sold by the Navy Department for $3,515, was burned on the mud flats of San Francisco Bay for the copper in her hull. This vessel made its appearance as the flagship of Commodore Bainbridge in 1815 at the head of the first naval fleet of the United States that ever assembled in foreign waters to settle our little difficulty with Algiers. She is described as the first American line-of-battle ship, and had three decks carrying at that time, 74 guns. She was designed for the war of 1812, but was not launched until 1814. In 1836, as a 34-gun frigate in command of Commodore Nicholson, the Independence took our minister

George Dallas, to Russia, breaking all records between New York and Cronstadt. Later the vessel took part in the Mexican war. In 1850 the Independence was again a flagship for a short time, and then was assigned as receiving ship at the Mare Island Navy Yard, San Francisco. We venture the suggestion that it might be impossible for the Federal Government or the individual state governments to devise a plan for utilizing some of the woodwork of such interesting relics of our history, in the construction of pieces of furniture to be placed in government offices, or in the construction of some other useful things that might be pointed to as made of such material.

"THE CHURCHES' WILKINSON TASK TO BE DONE BY THE WHOLE CHURCH." This is a motivating slogan characterizes the present undertaking of the Layman's Missionary Movement to quicken church life throughout the United States and make about the long-desired, long-sought mobilization of Christian people in a concerted campaign against ignorance, indifference and sin. Beginning in Chicago, conventions are planned to be held all over the country. Detailed plans have been laid down for getting the utmost results from these representative meetings of the different religious bodies, and such topics will be discussed as "What Must America Do Under the New World Conditions?"; "The Will of God to the Church of Today"; "The Adequacy of the Gospel to Meet Modern Industrial and Social Conditions"; "Religion in Business and Business in Religion"; and "What Would It Mean If Laymen Generally Were Good Soldiers of Jesus?"

INDIANA EXPERIMENTS IN POLITICS. The new primary law of the state of Indiana relieves party delegates to a national convention from the burden of making a choice of a presidential candidate, inasmuch as the presidential preference of the voters will be shown at the primaries and the choice must be voted for by the party delegation as long as his name is before the convention. Only in the case of his withdrawal or failure of nomination delegates exercise independent judgment. By the new law candidates for whatever office, that of President down to the smallest post, must pay a fee in order to have his name placed on the ballot, the fee for presidential vice-presidential candidates being $100. To give an acute example, if President Wilson, the logical candidate of Indiana democracy, is to be considered by the electorate of that state in the next presidential campaign, he must pay $100 to have his name placed upon the ballots. We are not sufficiently supplied with data to discuss this economical or precautionary or whatever of measure it is, but it requires only a moment to compute that if all the states adopt the principle, each presidential candidate in the future must have at least $1,500 ready at the gate before he can enter the game.

IRS HEAT FUSES STEEL. A new combination of steel plant is in process of formation by the syndicate starting with the Midvale Steel Company, one of the three armor-making companies of this country and occupying over 100 acres at Nicetown near Philadelphia. The price paid for this independent company is said to be $21,000,000. Several other independents are being acquired as probably booked for the new combination. William E. Cony, former president of the United States Steel Corporation, Percy Rockefeller, son of William Rockefeller, and Charles M. Schwab, president of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation, are mentioned as among the organizers. It is rumored that the latter will merge with the Midvale Company and become the largest armor plant in the United States. The really are two new mergers being talked of, but the public is only vaguely informed of the whole subject. Possibly when the deal is complete there will be no more independent steel companies. The Midvale has declined to take the war to make munitions for other countries its output to this country.

STAMP OUT THE HOOKWORM. Although you won't find hookworm in Webster's dictionary, the Rockefeller Foundation has found it a world-enriching belt inhabited by 900,000,000 of the 1,600,000,000 of earth's population. The infection zone extends from parallel 36 degrees north to parallel 20 degrees south, and all the countries in whole or in part in that belt are subject to the disease. Fifty per cent of the laboring classes in Egypt are found to be infected, infection as high as 90 per cent. Of nearly a million of our own Southern children who were examined, 30 per cent were found to be infected. The International Health Commission has had the work of devising means for the eradication of this wasting disease. At present the efforts of scientists are directed to educating the people on the subject preliminary to the medical efforts at eradication.

WAS CHIEFLY THE VICTIMS OF THIS HURRICANE. Every year the whole peach crop of the United States is ruined according to advance press reports of early frosts. Now it is the banana crop that has gone. Recent W. Indian hurricanes destroyed 15,000,000 bunches of the fruit, despatches from Jamaica state and a consequent shortage will be felt here in next July. Every one of those millions of bananas was looked forward to by the boys of Africa, and now only the Costa Rican crop of a very 10,000,000 bunches and the balance of Jamaica's crop say 5,000,000 bunches, can be depended on, unless this banana tale is a case of too peach stories.

PERHAPS THIS IS A FREE ADVERTISE. M.T. Potato-growers are said to be thinking of establishing a system of state certification of potato seed, the expenses to be borne by them. It claimed that certified seed used in New Jersey this year produced better crops than ordinary seed. Three inspections are made before the certificate is issued, at blossoming time, as it is possible before opening and at the digging. The United States Department of Agriculture issues a certificate against powdery scab, but this is to be an insurance against every potato fault.

THERE ARE BOY SCOUTS AND BOY SCOUTS. Recently the press contained accounts of a sort of military encampment with battle drills and almost serious thoughts of possible service, held under the auspices of the Boy Scouts. Photographers sent out pictures of the stern young warriors, and the story seemed calculated to inspire similar ambitions in other 28-inch chests. It inspired very different emotions in thousands of parents who are not yet ready to turn the public schools into military academies, and who understood that the Boy Scouts organization was opposed to military training for its members. The explanation is, that there is more than one boy scout organization. The Boy Scouts of America is the society most generally known and in spite of the presence upon its board of officers of several leading militarists of the country it is on record as against military training for boys. Military ideas have no place in its scheme of work, and its fine reputation sometimes suffers because of the character of the sport and physical drills employed by other boy scout societies. The organization that held the military encampment was, we believe, the United States Boy Scouts. The Boy Scouts of America have their headquarters at 200 Fifth Avenue, New York, and this is the organization usually thought of when Boy Scout is mentioned. Dan Beard, Ernest Thompson Seton, Cohn H. Livingston, both our living ex-Presidents, David Starr Jordan, and other well-known men are on the board of officers. President Wilson, being the honorary president, Louis L. West, chief scout executive, states to the Christian Herald that the Boy Scouts of America agree with the ideas of General Baden Powell and other educators, including some of our best military authorities, that efforts to give small boys military training are not only injurious to the boys, but do not accomplish the purpose intended.

REAL PATRIOTISM. A late number of the London Times that of September 9 to no extent contained a most pertinent personal observation. Last year killed a child, a military and a child, and the life of the child and the happiness of the man, blinded or otherwise, was sacrificed to the war.

WANTED A SOLOMON. Of which inceptor's dream is the true new solvable idea, the chief Heron, books or Professor Parkers' Unless some modern Solomon decides Secretary Daniels may have to refuse to accept the idea at all. Such a threatening attitude ought surely to bring from the real world a noble communication so that the "child" may be saved to end war, which is we understand the mission it is to perform. Professor Herschel C. Parker of New York City has championed the idea as his M. Food as is stated on another page of this issue of the Christian Herald, claims it as his. We cannot give the history of the controversy. The thing itself is a very small submarine, propelled by a gasoline engine and having eyes and ears in which it can detect the presence of enemy vessels, especially other submarines, and destroy them on sight. This is the new model. A thousand says Professor Parker would cost no more than a single super-dreadnought, and that number would make this country invulnerable. This diminutive undersea boat will have a speed of forty miles an hour, and the agility of a fish. It will carry two men and one torpedo. But the important thing is, who invented it?

THE WEAPONS OF OUR WARFARE ARE NOT CARNAL. In giving space recently to a belligerent utterance in a New York pulpit, the press did not leave itself enough space to more than quote an utterance from another pulpit along the same line, this time by Dr. Charles E. Jefferson of the Broadway Tabernacle, who declared that the Christian Church is expected to fight, to attack, to destroy. Our criticism is not that the nation ought not to fight; it is that the weapons chosen to fight with are not the right ones. The real non-resistance of the average Christian is that which uses not gunpowder, but love. Christians must fight, but their weapons at this moment are good-will, friendship, prayer. These have settled more troubles every year since Christ's era dawned than all the cannon fired since gunpowder was invented. It would be interesting to observe Dr. Jefferson and Colonel Roosevelt arguing this in a canoe, having first solemnly pledged each other not to rock the boat.

NO LETUP IN Y. M. C. A. WORK. The International Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association states in its annual report that there has been a gain of eight associations in the year, and an increase of $3,137,000 in property. Y. M. C. A. property throughout the world is valued at $103,394,000. About $14,000,000 was expended in the work, of which $1,070,000 was for education. The total membership is 620,799.

AMERICANS WIN IN FRANCE. A splendid work of mercy is being carried on in France by the American Ambulance Hospital in Neuilly-sur-Seine, a suburb of Paris. This was founded more than a year ago and through American liberality and the voluntary service of the highest surgical skill of our country has won recognition as the best equipped and most efficient military hospital now in existence. Attached to the hospital is an ambulance or transportation service, of more than a hundred American automobiles, manned by young American men as drivers and orderlies. This service is divided into sections, three of which are serving at the front with the French army. The efficiency of the organization is displayed in the following figures: From September, 1914, to the beginning of July in this year, the hospital records showed 109,537 hospital days. Costs had been reduced from $2 per patient per day to $1.16, and the number of patients had risen from 161 to 535. The Paris squad of motorambulances had carried in May 932 wounded. The field sections carried in May 10,505 wounded. And since last September in eight months, nearly forty thousand wounded soldiers have been safely carried by these Americans from the roar of the line of battle to the comfort and security of the hospitals.

WASHINGTON TO BE THE WORLD CENTER OF ROMAN CATHOLIC EDUCATION.

If recent news reports are correct in their facts and surmises, a unionizing of Catholic institutions of learning in this country at Brookland, in the outskirts of the national capital, is taking place on a scale that will give the church "an educational center in the environs of Washington."

that will overshadow Rome or any other European city. Why such a plan should be prosecuted "in secret" is not clear, but that course seems to prevail.

SHORING UP NEW YORK CITY. Three days after the cave-in of the new subway excavation mentioned on the opposite page, which went to press before this page, a second and similar accident occurred at 38th Street and Broadway through the giving way of the shoring intended to hold up the surface of the street. One person was killed and others injured. The consequence of this new menace to life and property and to business because the streets where the accidents occurred are practically closed to all traffic, has been a temporary suspension of much of the surface car transportation to permit experts to make a rigid inspection of all the subway work now under way and to require guarantees of safety.

ONLY ORGANIZED CARNAGE RECOGNIZED. A shipment of cartridges and rifles was held up at the Mexican border on September 26 on orders from Washington, presumably, until it could be determined whether the goods will reach Villa and Carranza factions instead of independent bands and border raiders. This is a very nice distinction in the matter of supplying materials of destruction to a people who are engaged in an orgy of suicide.

NOTED ENGLISH LABOR LEADER DIES. James Keir Hardie died at Glasgow from pneumonia, September 26, at the age of fifty-nine years. Mr. Hardie was a Scotchman. His parents were of the working class and he began his career as a pit boy in the mines at the age of seven and remained a miner until he was twenty-four. He employed his spare time in studying, and became a temperance leader and labor reformer. Eventually he became one of the political leaders in the British Labor Party and in 1892 was elected to Parliament. It is said that his advent to the House was marked by the coincident appearance of a Scotch cap, contrary to commemorial precedent which required that members wear silk hats only. The Speaker was asked to rule the new member out of order, but failing to find any support in the Constitution for the silk hat rule was obliged to give Hardie his way. Afterward other members took advantage of the innovation, and the silk hat rule became a thing of the past. But Mr. Hardie's fame rests upon more important deeds which his independent nature gave him the courage to perform in the interests of workingmen. He has been a champion of trade unionism and a bitter opponent of war, and on the latter account particularly has been the object of hostile attack from other elements in the government. Although not a prominent figure in the present situation, he was recognized as a leader of the peace element in the British Socialist Party.

MULTIPLY THIS BY 48. The Chicago Herald not long ago compiled some statistics of casualties in the state of Wisconsin due to conditions under which men and women do their work. From July 1, 1912, until December 31, 1914, industrial accidents in the ordinary course of business totaled 24,000, with varying results. Over 11,000 serious accidents occurred during 1914, not including those on railroads or in industries not included in the Workmen's Compensation Law. In that year, the compiler for the Chicago Herald estimates, 6,300 working years were lost through accident, involving over three million dollars in wages, 116 wives were made widows and 220 children made fatherless; nearly 500 persons were maimed for life, 33 lost one eye each, a great many lost fingers in whole or part or suffered broken legs or arms and lesser fractures. This state of things is not, of course, attributable solely to employers, but the record, which is declared to be fairly representative of conditions in modern industry, should serve at least to divide our national horror between the awfulness of war and the awfulness of industrial greed, not forgetting the element of culpable carelessness in individuals.

Three Steps to Salvation

AN UNPUBLISHED REVIVAL SERMON BY D. L. MOODY*

I DON'T want to preach a sermon today so much as to tell you in plain words the Way of Life. I believe there are a great many here who are honestly, anxiously and seriously inquiring what they must do to be saved.

Now, I am going to call your attention to three verses in the tenth chapter of Paul's letter to the Romans; and I honestly believe that if Paul were here himself in my place—if he could come back from that world of light where he has been these last eighteen or nineteen hundred years—he could not make the way any plainer than he has made it in that chapter, in the ninth, tenth and eleventh verses: "If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved; for with the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation. For the Scripture saith, Whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed."

Now, you will notice three stages in these three verses: First, to believe with the heart; next, to confess with the mouth; and the next, not to be ashamed of it. And for these forty years in which I have been engaged in Christian work, trying to lead men to Christ, into the kingdom of God, never in my life have I seen any one willing to take those three steps that the light of Calvary didn't burst in upon him.

All Things Possible to Him That Believeth

I've often said that there would be a great rush into the kingdom of God if a man could get into heaven without going by the way of Calvary; if he could slip around that hill and get on the Mount of Transfiguration, stepping over the Cross and getting Christianity, there'd be a great rush that way. But it can't be done! The way to heaven is straight; but in the way there's a Cross. If you attempt to go under or around it or over it, you remain in your sin. If you want to get into the way of heaven, take up your cross—do it now. Follow Jesus Christ!

In Chicago some years ago the battle was going very hard, and the tide seemed to set against us. One day at the noon meeting one of the leading railroad men of that city, who stood perhaps as high as any business man there, to my great amazement rose in the back of the hall and said: "I notice by the papers there's been a good deal of ridicule cast upon this meeting, and the thought occurred to me this morning that if I was a true disciple I ought to take my share of the odium, and if there's any odium to be cast on Christ's cause I want to take my part." I suppose he thought if he was going to share the glory with Christ, he must share the odium of persecution, also.

My friends, keep that in mind: If we are to be partners with him in glory, we are to be partners down here, and take up our cross daily and follow him. I don't suppose there's any need, and I wouldn't spend much time in defending the meetings, but there's need of confessing Christ. It would be a better day in your life to confess Christ right here, where there's so much said against the meetings. When you hear people sneering, jeering at your tables, at the church or at God's people, you should stand up for the Son of God and let people know whose side you're on.

Man! Who claims your influence down there in the street where you live, or in the shop where you work, or in the societies you belong to? Are you known as a Christian? Are you bearing your cross daily? That's what it is—at the table for Jesus Christ! If you are ashamed of him, of course you are not worthy to be his disciple.

What would you think of a man who would like to get into an office, say, of policeman, but who doesn't want any one to know it? He isn't willing to put on the uniform. Do you think he would be a very serviceable policeman, or that your life or property would be safe with such a watchman as that? Are there any commissioners who would appoint such a policeman?

Here's a man who wants to hire a servant, and wants him to put on the livery. A man wants to enter his service, but objects to having any one know that he is a servant or to put on the livery. If you are to be a servant of Christ you know you've got to put on the livery.

It takes a hero to be a child of God. Mark that! Some people think a man's a coward who comes out and confesses Christ. "Don't you believe it! It takes moral courage. And the lack of moral courage keeps more people out of the kingdom of God than anything else.

Now, while I am speaking, some of you are saying, "Well, really, if I should confess Christ, what would they say?" What would they say? "You were up to hear Moody, wasn't you? Did Moody catch you? Did you get converted? Did you get pious? Did you get religion?" And you sneak off like a hound, and say, "No sir. I don't believe in Moody; never want to hear him." That's what you'd do. I'm talking facts. It takes courage to confess Christ! You haven't got courage to go home and tell the wife of your bosom that you want to be a child of God. Oh, I pity a man who will be laughed out of a principle. Is it right to serve God? Take your stand and stand. Confess him down here, and he will honor the stand. Then eternal life begins.

The Struggle with Self-Consciousness

A man told me this: "I'd rather stand up and be shot at than do what you ask. I can't let anybody know." I said, "You'll never get into the kingdom of God, then." He tried other ways, but couldn't get in till he came in the regular way. You'll never be a disciple of Jesus Christ if you are ashamed of him. For he says, "If you're ashamed of me and my words you can't be my disciple." I don't want any better authority than his own words.

When I was preaching in the Hippodrome, in New York, a six-footer came into my inquiry room. I showed him the way. He seemed to want very much to be a Christian. I think he spent an hour with me. The next night I had another long talk with him. I could bring him up to a certain line, but couldn't get him across. I had him a good many nights; and finally I said to a prominent layman, "I wish you'd get that man's confidence and see what it is that's keeping him from Christ." He had two or three interviews with the man and gave it up. But one night, at the young men's meeting, the man stood up and confessed that he had found Jesus Christ. I said, "What was the obstacle that kept you so long?" He colored up clear to the roots of his hair. He seemed very much embarrassed; and finally he said that the first night I talked with him the thought came to his mind, "If you become a Christian you've got to get the Bible and read it before your room-mate, and he will laugh at you." He tried every way he could to get into the kingdom of God and not let that room-mate know it. Now, that's just the way not to get in. He said that night after night that cross came right up: "You've got to get the Bible out and read it before that room-mate." And he thought he never could do it. That room-mate would laugh at him. But one night the burden became so great he thought he would read anyway. He got out his Bible, and then he heard his room-mate coming in. He had thought he would get it over before his room-mate returned. His first impulse was to put the Bible back and let nobody know. His second thought was, "Now is the time to let him know." So he sat there reading, and the room-mate came in and said, "What are you interested in the Bible?" He said, "I am." Now, it's a good thing to get your lips open, and to say just that. "Why," said the other, "how long have you been interested?" "Well, I've been going up to the Hippodrome to hear that man Moody, and such a night he preached on such a text, and he woke me up, and I made up my mind to become a Christian; but I've been a coward. I wasn't willing to read or pray before you. I thought you would laugh at me. And I've been all these nights greatly troubled; but I made up my mind tonight that I would have my Bible, and read and pray, and let you laugh all you wanted to."

Victory Through Faith

"Well, now!" said the room-mate, "that's rather singular. I've been attending those meetings myself." And there those two cowards had sneaked out, both under conviction. Oh, well! the city is full of them. They are all around in these beer-houses, factories and shops—all around; and they are not willing to say they are under conviction, not having the courage to come out.

Then the room-mate said, "I was brought under conviction by that same sermon, and I've been trying to screw my courage up and get my Bible out and read before you." Well! it was nothing to laugh at. But if I had a looking-glass here I'd show you lots of such men.

It's not hard to get into the kingdom of God if you're willing to take the right way. Go home and tell your friends what great things God has done for you, and that he has had compassion on you and the light that comes from the world above will shine upon you in the very act of doing it.

Just think that in this audience some man, some woman, may confess Jesus Christ here today, and twenty or thirty years hence there may be thousands who will be turned to Christ through the influence of that simple conversion.

Still another letter I will quote from. I was received this morning. The writer says: The last time I heard you was in Liverpool twenty years ago. There were three of us who went to hear you, to make sport and ridicule. We were fast young men." And he says that at the close of the services they went away to pray; and "that night we took hands with each other and said, 'We'll bid farewell soon, but thank God, we've turned to Christ!'" One of his two friends died as a missionary in the Congo; another served God in Egypt. The letter adds: "I have got three sons and they are on the Lord's side." It is a great thing to stand up for Jesus Christ.

I pray that every one of us who stands up to be true to Jesus Christ; that we may confess him fully and boldly; that we may give no uncertain sound, but confess him in season and out of season. You aged men haven't got a long time now in which to confess Christ. Do it today, while men are crying their souls on him; do it while you have an opportunity to confess him.

It may be that some one here has a son who is sliding down through strong drink, or gambling, or some other course of sin, and if you throw your influence on the wrong side, you'll regret it through all eternity. Stand for God, and don't be laughed out of it! Stand it now!

I thank God he will accept anybody's testimony. A little one can lead them. Many a man has been led to Christ through no minister, but by a little child. Many an infidel has been led to Christ by me young daughter.

Good News That Can't Be Kept In

Many years ago, near my mission school in Chicago, there lived an old infidel. He was very angry because I had started a mission school near his home. An old proverb says, "Like priest, like people," and you can say honestly, "Like parents, like children." Those children knew that their father and mother didn't like me; and when I went past the house they called me a hypocrite and everything else that was bad. I worked for months to get the children to my Sabbath school, but got nothing but curses from children or parents. One night I had a lot of boys meet, and I noticed that one of this man's boys—a lad of about thirteen—had come in. I thought at first that God had sent him; but before the meeting was over I began to believe that perhaps Satan had sent him, for he was sticking pins into the other boys and doing everything he could to break up the meeting. I kept quiet. And when they were going in, I said, "Allie, I'm really glad you came in. I hope you'll come again." He felt ashamed when I spoke kindly to him after he had misbehaved so badly, and promised to come the next night. And he came right after night. One night he got up and said, "Ers, you know all about my home, and you know all about me. I wish you would pray God to convert me; I'd like to be a Christian." I said, "That's another wedge into that infidel's family."

About five weeks after that I noticed Allie weeping. I thought perhaps he'd met some failure during the day. He got up, weeping, and said, "Boys, I shall pray for my mother." I said, "Thank God for that." And after prayer I got him aside and said, "Allie, did you ever tell your mother what God has done for you?" "No," he said, "but I have tried so hard to show it in my life. I have been kind, I could and have done everything I could to please them." I said, "That's splendid. But a joy will come if you confess Christ. And now, when you go home, won't you ask your mother to let you pray with her?" He said he couldn't. I said, "You'll tell your mother what the Lord has done for you." He did so and that mother became a true Christian. She came to the mission school and inside of ten weeks every member of that family was a Christian but one.

Let every one who has ever confessed Christ and wishes to do so now, rise, and so confess him.

Daily Meditation

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR

The Rock That Is Higher

SUNDAY, October 10. Ps. 61 : 2. "Lead me to the Rock that is higher than I." There is no more tragic condition in life than for the soul to have nothing near it bigger than itself. Spiritual death makes an easy victim of the soul that has nothing to look up to, nothing beyond. The essential secrets of spiritual life and progress are to be in reverence, and wonder, and admiration, and awe; and when all these have fallen asleep the soul has been surely touched with the finger of death. Our life shrinks into littleness when we see no rock that is higher than ourselves. But when we can lift up our eyes unto the hills, the power of the heights will come upon us, and we shall sing as we feel their inspiring ministry: "How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of them that bring us good tidings!" We need "the shadow of a great rock in a weary land." After the fierce heat and dust of the open road how restful it is to pass into the deep, cool shade of a friendly rock! I have seen the flock leave the exposed pastures in the glowing heat of the noon, and seek the refreshing shelter of a hospitable rock. And we, too, can rest in the shadow of the Almighty in the oppressive rays of the noon. Just when I am inclined to be faint there is a Rock that is higher than I, and in that cooling Presence He restoreth my soul. All we need "the Rock that is higher" in order that we may have lofty and comprehensive vision. I am so apt to get lost in details, and I lose the sense of the whole. I become absorbed in the fortunes of the immediate battle, and I lose the sense of the campaign. Or I become a victim of the letter, and I lose the large freedom of the spirit. I need to look upon this from a higher point of view. I must see them from above. I want a Rock that is higher than I. All I need a Rock in which I can find a lofty refuge when I am pursued by my own sin. It must not only be shadow from the heat but a shelter from the tempest. It must hide me till the storm of life is past. Anchor Rock is Christ.

"Rock of Ages, cleft for me, Let me hide myself in Thee."

God's Purpose in Our Lives

MONDAY, October 11. Isaiah 46 : 1-13. "I have made, and I will bear." When a father sees his own nature reappearing in his child—the same temper, peculiarities, and passions—so far from casting the child aside and quoting its faults as a reason for disowning it, he draws nearer to it, filled with a great pity, and murmurs, "I have made, and I will bear." When one has elicited in another a love that will never rest until it has established its claim for him to give in return, as he considers the greatness of the love he has evoked, he says to himself, "I have made, and I will bear." When a Christian minister has gathered around him a large congregation of poor people whom he has raised from the paths, when lucrative offers tempt him elsewhere, he is disposed to refuse them, because he says, "I have made, and I will bear." Let us ascend to the Divine nature. He has made us, and not we ourselves. His hands have fashioned us, and his breath has inspired our life. He has implanted in our appetites which he alone can satisfy. He has placed us in circumstances of unusual difficulty, and entrusted to our hands work of unwonted importance. The cost of duty, which taxes us to the uttermost, is his pointment. Is he not rightfully responsible for all we need in order to fulfil his own program? He has made, must he not bear? Is it not legitimate to look to him to finish his own purpose and perfect that which concerneth us? In hours of anguish for sin; in moments of terrific strain and anxiety; in days of supreme peril, or perplexity as to our duty; in the time of old age, when our powers have begun to fail; in the hour of death, and in the day of judgment may we not hear him saying: "Even to old age I have, and to hoary hairs will I carry you; I have made, and I will bear." Let Me Pass It On TUESDAY, October 12. Rev. 22 : 2. "And on this side of the river and on that was the tree of life, bearing twelve manner of fruits." The kingdom of God is here pictured as a garden, filled with abundance of fruit, while beneath the spreading leaves the nations are healed. The Christian's life is known by its fruits and by the way that fruitage is spread abroad for the saving health of those about him. The life of the Son of God is known not by what it takes, but by what it shares—by what it passes on. The fruit of the Spirit, says the writer to the Galatians, are "love, joy, peace, longsuffering, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, meekness, self-control"—all things to be passed on—all things that hold their value largely because they are passed on to others. Most of these virtues of the Christian would lose their point in a solitary world, with none others beside one's self to be helped and healed.

Not what we have but what we share—what we pass on with free and generous hand—that is the sign of our membership in the kingdom of Love, which is the heavenly kingdom. The stolen fruit in the garden of God is the fruit we eat alone. The stolen thoughts in the garden of culture are those we think alone and do not pass on. The stolen joys in the pathway of life are those we do not pass to cheer sad and wayworn hearts. The stolen leaves of healing from the tree of life are those we do not spread above some suffering, invalid soul.

Every one has some bits of manna that he may scatter in a brother's desert. Every one has some glimpses of Eden with which he may brighten another's night.

"Have I a good impulse, let me pass it on.
Have I a song of hope, let me pass it on.
Have I a sympathy, let me pass it on.
Have I a loving thought, let me pass it on."

The great things of earth are those that have been passed on. Heaven is made up of generously scattered love. Paradise is regained for many souls through the prayers that we pass down the ages.

What Fellowship with Christ Means

WEDNESDAY, October 13. John 13 : 31-34. "Thou canst not follow me now, but thou shalt follow me afterwards." The words staggered Peter. He could not see how much had to be done before he could share in Christ's coming glory. He made the same mistake James and John had made before, and wanted the throne without perceiving that it was conditioned on fellowship in the cup and baptism of blood. With deep emotion he persisted in his inquiries, "Why not now? There is no place on earth to which I would not go with Thee. Have I not already left all to follow Thee? Have I not been with Thee on the Transfiguration mount, and beside the bed of death? There is but one experience through which I have not passed with Thee, and if death should stand as next in thy life-plan, I will lay down my life for Thy sake. Anything to be with Thee!"

How little Peter knew himself! How much better Christ knew him! "What! Dost thou profess thyself willing to die with me? Verily, verily, I say unto thee, between now and tomorrow morning at cock-crow, thou shalt deny me thrice." These words silenced Peter for all the evening afterwards. He does not appear to have made one other remark, but to have been absorbed in heart-breaking grief. Yet surely that grief must have been modified by the remainder of that sentence: "Thou shalt follow me afterwards." We cannot stoop to the low door that opens into life. Like Peter we have to be broken on the wheel, and humbled to the dust. We must descend with Christ, before ascending with him. We must lie in his grave, ere ascending to his throne. The process is painful and humiliating, so he hastens to say: "Let not your heart be troubled. Ye believe in God, believe also in me." F. B. M.

The Gospel for Society

THURSDAY, October 14. Matthew 7 : 12. "As ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them." While Jesus did not give as specific directions as have some founders of religions regarding the attitude of the individual to society, he left in the Sermon on the Mount the plain general principles for our attitude and our service toward our neighbors. It was a gospel that if put into full effect would revolutionize society. Already it is beginning to be felt in this age of service. But we are yet far from achievement of his ideal.

He taught that human value is the great value. He said we were to love our neighbors as we love ourselves. The Golden Rule of brotherly reciprocity was to be the working principle of our lives. It should be a vital, active rule in our treatment of wealth, of property, of labor and of home affairs. There should be in fact no part of our relationship with others untouched by this spirit of doing unto others as we would like them to do to us.

The Christian character is a social character as well as an individual one. A man of business may not be religious by being good on Sunday merely; it is the way his goodness and justice get incorporated in his shop or mill during the week that is to prove the force and reality of his faith, according to Jesus' words. The man who says that drinking moderately does him no harm, has not caught the first meaning of this love-of-others rule which is the Christian social gospel. Does drink harm his neighbor? This also must be his concern.

A Christian business man of large interests has this motto in his office: "How would I feel in his place?" He is a social Christian. C. S. C.

The Christian's Guardianship

FRIDAY, October 15. I Tim. 1 : 1-11. "The glorious Gospel, committed to my trust." We may refer to this noble boast words spoken of an incident in Ezra 8, where the little band of 1,700 Jews were starting on their long march from Babylon to Jerusalem, their ruined city. Their leader entrusts to their special care a very valuable treasure in gold, silver, and sacrificial vessels, which had been given them for use in the house of God. This was his address, as he placed each vessel in the reverent grasp of its selected custodian: "Watch and keep it, until ye weigh it in the chambers of the house of the Lord."

This is it with each of us. First we must guard and keep the rich treasure and solemn trust of our own souls—our conscience, heart, mind, and judgment. Next we are entrusted with that great deposit and treasure of Christian truth, which is all embodied and incarnated in Jesus Christ our Lord. It is bestowed on us that we may use it for ourselves, and that we may carry it forth for the use of the world. These treasures require unceasing vigilance. Enemies lie in wait on the way; and there are the perils arising from our cowardice, vacillation, and incompetence. Shall we ever be able to carry unhurt and undiminished those great treasures which God has placed in our care for others? Often must those Jews have anticipated the hour when they would empty their rich treasure upon the marble pavement, and place the golden vessels on the scales! And may we not nerve our hearts amid many trials by anticipating that great hour when we shall meet Christ and say, "Lord, thy pound hath gained ten more"? F. B. M.

The Criticism of Envy

SATURDAY, October 16. John 12 : 8. "The poor ye have always with you; but ye have not always." Jesus did not argue with Judas, but, with infinite patience and pathos, he remarked, "Me ye have not always." Let Mary lavish her precious treasure upon me; she could not anoint my feet when bleeding on Calvary; this is her only moment. It is dear to me to have appreciation from even one person, when the multitudes misjudged and disowned me. Then he placed this unfading crown upon her brow: "She hath done what she could."

The precious ointment only cost Mary what Judas was soon to receive for his betrayal of the Master. What a contrast! the one who criticizes the gift is ready to sell his Lord. The one who anoints and worships at his feet is ready to die for Jesus.

Christ became poor that, through his poverty, the poor might become rich. He was on his way to die for the poor lost ones. Devotion to Jesus should always result in beneficence toward the needy. The poor are a legacy we have always, but Jesus was going away. We can cherish the spirit of the Inasmuch when he has ascended, but not let us linger at his feet and gaze upon his face. Mary was the Good Samaritan to Jesus, who was so soon to be wounded among those who should have been his friends.

Noonday Chimes

EVERY week-day at noon, the chimes of Grace Church in New York send down into the clatter of Broadway the strains of old, familiar hymns. Sometimes if one is not paying attention, or when a new tune is taken up, the clangor of the bells seems only to add to the confusion. Then, gradually, the theme of the old-time melody steals upon the senses through the tumult. The other day the chimes had just finished Pleyel's Hymn. They began a new melody, which, in the midst of the city's roar, was not at first distinguishable. Then the tangle of notes unwound itself and through the noises of the street sounded the sweet notes of "Just As I Am, Without One Plea."

Car-wheels clanked; car-brakes shrieked; iron-shod horse-hoofs smote the stones of the street; motor-horns blew raucously; there was the sound of a myriad human feet and of many human voices; and through it all—"Just As I Am, Without One Plea."

Pedestrians took up the theme and hummed it absentmindedly. Old scenes were brought back; old faiths strengthened; old blessings remembered. Greater than the city; greater than all its work and its woe and its sin—is the grace of God. Greater than to achieve high victories; greater than to understand vast mysteries; greater than the gains of honor and wealth; greater than the satisfactions of toil—is the thought of God and of what he has done to rid the world of sin. Higher than all calls is the call of the Cross. Nobler than any other declaration that human tongue can make is this:

"Just as I am, without one plea,
But that thy blood was shed for me,
And that thou bidst me come to thee,
O Lamb of God, I come, I come!"

The Viking's Triumph

THE triumphs of three centuries of Arctic exploration have been eclipsed by a single brave effort in this year of great events. All doubt as to the actual existence of a hitherto unknown continent in the Arctic Ocean is set at rest by the remarkable discovery announced in the report of Vilhjalmur Stefansson, the explorer, received in a message from Nome, Alaska, on September 17. The intrepid voyager on June 18, after a year of investigation, sighted and set foot upon the new continent at a point near 78 degrees north and 117 west. He followed the coast three days, sailing southeast by east, and covering a distance of over 100 miles. It was a rugged land, level in some parts, in others rolling and with mountain ranges in the distance. There was an abundance of animal life. Later advices, when received, will doubtless convey to the world a more detailed account of this wonderful discovery, which has been foreshadowed by previous explorers, but never with the voice of certainty until now. Stefansson, who was thought to have perished with the greater part of his crew, will receive a royal welcome on his return to civilization. It was a Viking who, long before the day of Columbus, first set foot on the new western world. There is something of the old Viking spirit in this man who, in the year of the greatest turmoil the world has ever known, has searched the polar solitudes and won the glorious prize for which dauntless souls have contended. His name will live long after those of the heroes of battle are forgotten.

The Ordeal of Conscience

SINCE the days of Henry Ward Beecher, historic Plymouth Church in Brooklyn has had no more popular or eloquent pastor than Newell Dwight Hillis. He has been the idol of his flock; and when, on a recent occasion, he stood up before them and with deep emotion confessed that he had fallen from his high ministerial ideal and had tried to serve God and Mammon simultaneously, it was little wonder that his congregation sat amazed at his voluntary self-abasement. With true courage, he was facing a situation from which there was only one way out. He told them how for ten years he had been striving, by unministerial and worldly methods, to secure a provision for his family and those dependent upon him; how he had made investments which he felt assured were sound and safe, yet they all went wrong; how in his struggle for wealth he had suffered through over-confidence and inexperience, and had been the means of involving others in doubtful ventures. Now the whole fabric of his financial hopes had been hopelessly shattered; but he had enough left to discharge his obligations and begin life over again, stripped of property, but free from the burden of debt.

But Dr. Hillis, urged by a reawakened conscience, went even further in his self-imposed ordeal. He told of the great sorrow he felt lest the influence of his ministry should have been a means of leading students and young preachers toward the material prizes of life instead of to the spiritual triumphs. During the years of his wanderings after money and fame, he had many an hour in which he felt the conviction that "a minister has no right to make money, and does his best work without it." There were times when he felt that he was not worthy even to untie the shoestrings of the humblest home missionary or social worker. But he would look forward, and across the chasm that had separated him from his high ideals he would cry, as did the publican, "God be merciful to me a sinner!"

It was a brave, honorable and unsparing confession. When a Christian pastor has the courage to bare his heart to his people, forgiveness cannot be withheld. Whatever the complications, we trust he will be able to overcome them, and to do better work than ever in his ministry, now that he has passed through the fire. His sincerity cannot be questioned, and he has set an example for others who may be "overtaken in a fault" but who have lacked the courage to face their troubles in a cleansing and strengthening public avowal.

Rockefeller at Trinidad

Seldom has a young man made a visit anywhere that has caused so much comment and aroused so many varying sorts of interest as the visit of John D. Rockefeller, Jr., to the coal-fields of Colorado. Some months ago he promised "Mother" Jones he would make this journey, and many interested persons had reached the conclusion that he had no intention of fulfilling his promise, when the news went forth, on September 20, that he had arrived on the scene of the tragic occurrences of two years ago. Some of the miners were suspicious and offish; some greeted him cordially; some were won over by his gracious manner; some were busy taking steps to have him arrested.

Just what the outcome of his visit will be is at this date problematical. It is not at all likely that he will be arrested, and it is hardly likely that he will win all the miners to admiration and confidence. The findings of the main report of the Walsh Commission, which laid directly at the door of this young man the hideous conditions of the mines and mining camps and towns of Colorado, will hardly be offset by his willingness to borrow a miner's pick and dig coal for twenty minutes, his concern for the chafed back of a mule, and his kindly interest in the housewives and school children of Valdez.

If the findings of the Manley report can be upheld, Mr. Rockefeller has much to atone for. He has taken the right step and the brave step in going to the spot to observe things as they were. He has it in his power to make matters in these particular fields precisely what they ought to be.

"Rough But Kindly"

"ROUGH he was, yet kindly," was Longfellow's summary of Miles Standish, the stern, old, domineering Puritan captain. The phrase might be not inaptly applied to a New England soldier of the same type, who recently passed away at a ripe old age, after a characteristically stormy career. Anthony Comstock had served in the army, and when the Society for the Suppression of Vice was organized and he became its active representative, he carried something of military method into his work. He was rugged, brusque and combative; but it needed a man with just these qualities to deal with the class of criminals and degenerates he had to encounter. For over forty years he fought stoutly for purity. Many a blow he took and gave, but the essential fact remains that, owing to his energetic methods and utter disregard of personal consequences, much good was accomplished and the insidious forces of evil were held in check where they were not put to rout. Comstock's special field was the seizure and destruction of immoral literature, and the record shows that he destroyed over fifty tons of vile books, some four million vicious pictures, and an immense quantity of stereotyped plates and negatives, besides securing the conviction of upward of twenty-five hundred offenders against the law. His aggressiveness frequently made enemies, who fought him bitterly; but he loved the call of the battle, and it is not on record that he ever shirked a duty. But there were many others who, knowing his sincerity, his sturdy honesty and his fearless duty, stood by the old soldier and gave him support. It is doubtful whether any one of the type could have produced anything like the impression Anthony Comstock made upon the dangerous criminals who attack the morals of youth. He put his whole soul into the work and his muscles a well and his duties—many a time thankless and a pain—were more frequently rewarded with abuse than praise.

China's Friendship

IN a recent published statement, which seems to have been issued mainly with a view to influence foreign opinion, President Yuan Shi Kai of the republic of China declares his purpose of carrying out on conservative lines the policies which he believes to be best adapted to national development. He would aim at steady and substantial progress, rather than at immediate transient results. He would strengthen the foundations of the republic, encourage education, teach the people the value and responsibilities of citizenship, respect for law, and the right of liberty; he would develop industry so that every one may have a means of livelihood; and he is confident that China's natural resources are of a character and extent that will make the nation rich and great when they are developed. To carry out this program, foreign capital will be needed for a time. He loses by paying a tribute to the honesty and uprightness of the Chinese, who, "being under the same form of government and inspired by the same ideals" as the United States, are bound to maintain friendly relations and to make these relations firmer and more intimate. Read between the lines, the statement is a virtual notification that China is about to float a national loan, preferably in the American market.

Is He the God of Hate?

BELIEVERS in Peace and in the Power of Peace have been horrified by the persistent efforts to implicate the Deity in the present fiendish war. Dr. Charles A. Eaton, a prominent New York clergyman, said recently in a Sunday morning sermon: "The world was losing its soul. We needed a cross, and God has laid this cross upon the world." He declared that "this war is the latest blessing that has fallen upon mankind since the German Reformation."

Such expressions are extremely regrettable. Not God but man is drowning Europe in blood. War is not God's gift or God's punishment or God will. God hates war, and Christ has told the world so. There is no need for tangling up the unanswerable problem of pain with the perfectly answerable problem of war.

War takes place because men hate one another. Not even for the sake of punishing sin will God lead men to hate, or sanction that hatred and its fruits. Men began the war. Men are prolonging it. Men are preventing the dawn of peace. The war would cease at once, if men would lift up their minds to God and remember that he is the King of Love.

Making Colds in the Head Popular. Dr. Woods Hutchinson, a New York City authority on health, is quoted as recommending that every child in school shall be sent home immediately he sneezes or coughs or needs his handkerchief, and that executives in offices and stores and factories show the same anxious solicitude for their employees, the basis of the recommendation being that by such a course people who do not have colds will never catch any. It would be an interesting experiment. There are particularly attractive days and tempting occasions throughout the year when, we predict, our schools and workshops would be fairly empty; what would happen on ordinary days we will let our readers try to imagine.

This is really much more serious a matter than might seem to be the case from the above paragraph. There is a movement on foot in this country to revolutionize our methods of conserving health. Ignoring the vast safety zones, so to speak, constituted by the prudent, well-informed, careful element in our population who, without prompting from outside sources, look strict to the sanitation of their homes and the health of the members of their families, the sponsors of this movement would bring about legislation to compel every individual in our population to undergo at least annually an examination under the auspices of the state or county or municipality. There are such eminently sane ways to conserve the general health, and at the same time to restrict such compulsory medical attention to those who are ignorant or indifferent become a menace to the state, that the proposal overleaps the mark so completely as to begot the doubt of the disinterestedness of those who would bring it to pass.

Invents New Submarine

HENRY FORD went to Washington the other day to submit to Secretary Daniels a plan for a new submarine one-fourth the size of the present ones in use far more destructive, and in Mr. Ford's opinion, likely to hasten a world peace. In an interview the other day Mr. Ford said: "It will be no feat at all to produce a submarine equipped with a gasoline engine for the entire motive power, which could sail anywhere under the sea, carrying an explosive powerful enough to blow the mightiest battleship ever built into a wreck of junk. And the best of all, these submarines are built at such a slight cost that all the incentive for greedy armament-makers will be taken away from them. They will cost only a fraction of what the present submarines cost, and only a fraction of one per cent. of the $1,000,000 dreadnoughts which they will be able to blow to pieces. My machine has been successfully tested, and am willing to make a public demonstration of its efficiency. I believe that education will be the greatest factor in bringing about universal peace; but this new submarine is likely, by the terror that it inspires, to hasten a world peace." Simultaneously with the announcement by Mr. Ford of the invention of the new submarine, there has been the announcement also of the failure of the machine he invented with which he proposes to plow and harrow the soil, cultivate the crops, gather the harvest and transport them to the bar and market. It may be possible that the mighty engines employed for the destruction of human life may be used in God's hands for the destruction of it altogether, and that the whole world may take up the anthem, "Gloria to God in the Highest, and on earth peace, goodwill toward men." (Luke 2:14.)

Beautiful Thoughts

A MEMBER of a school board in a Western community, in an article in a local paper, asserts that school-teaching has a tendency to make beautiful faces. He says he has noticed many young women become handsome in a short time by feeling the deep truth, improve the mind and heart of the pupils, and the use of a tactful and meritorious attention to the work of communicating knowledge. He says there are some homely teachers, who are a little more strongly minded than the handsome ones, but they do not enter into their task with the same enthusiasm and joy as the others, and are not as valuable in the schoolroom. While exceptions might be taken to some of the author's statements, he is right in his contention that the profession of teaching is a beautiful one, and that beautiful features are carved by the invisible hand of high thought and pure affection. The powers of the springtime of life are transferred to the teacher's face. One of the most tremendous facts of life is that thoughts and sentiments do not make features into ugliness or beauty. The high-minded, true-hearted men and women have comely features that cannot be counterfeited. It is not necessary to tag men "Going to the prize fight or races, or haunts of vice"; hence they tell where they belong. No features can restore features spoiled by the finger-prints of sin. It is the business of the true Christian to wear a face not pinched by avarice or selfishness, darkened by anger or malevolent envy; but features beautiful, made so by faith, holiness and love. Thoughts of Christ and love for him will make the face Christlike, divine. The apostle thus expresses the thought: "But we all, with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord." (II Cor. 3:18.)

Boy's Devotion to Mother

IN the hope that it might save his mother's life, Jacob Rudley, a newsboy, fifteen years old, volunteered for a blood-transfusion operation at the German Hospital in Philadelphia.

About a quart of blood was pumped from his veins into those of his mother. For nearly three weeks Mrs. Rudley was in the hospital, while Jacob continued his calling at the corner of Eighth woven. At the Sansyusha silkworm weaving room, the selected silkworms were reared with the utmost care. The raw silk was sealed and sent to the imperial household department through the Aichi prefectural office. The cleaning work was started in the reel room. Forty girls wearing white working-clothes were employed. Beginning the work at six o'clock one morning, they finished it at four o'clock the same day. A certain amount of care and expense are proper in inducting the ruler of a nation into office, even in a republic. The costly wardrobes, the priceless jewels, the pomp and display in the ceremonial of crowning kings, that used to impress the world with awe and admiration, have a different impression

Blind in Wonderful Pageant

THREE students at the Overbrook Institution for the Blind in Philadelphia recently went through with faultless precision the various movements of a long pageant with a number of intricate folk dances and scenes. None of the participants could see, but so careful had been the drilling that by merely counting their steps the boys and girls were able to find their places in a line and go through the most intricate movements of set pieces without a hitch or a break. To the thousands of spectators who lined the four sides of the campus at the Institution, the sight was one of the marvels of this age of wonders in education. God made the eye as the window of the soul, and yet when that organ is weakened or destroyed, the soul has other methods of vision. It is the soul after all, and not the clay organ, which sees. Without the material eye, the soul can see the facts of nature, their relation to each other, the beauty behind them, their right, the duty to follow men, and God himself, the Author of all forms and forces of matter and mind. This climax of the soul's vision is thus announced by Christ in his Sermon on the Mount: "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." (Matt. 5:8.)

and Chestnut Streets. Every penny he earned he turned over to an older sister, who kept house, and never a day passed but he paid a visit to the hospital. Eventually Mrs. Rudley's condition grew so critical that physicians decided that nothing but an infusion of fresh blood would save her. The transfusion was performed with difficulty and Jacob was back at his job in a day or so, a little weak, but happy and hopeful of the mother's recovery. We do not have to go to the battlefields for all the heroes. This boy is one. The little newsboy was a real prince. The soul is saved from the death of sin by the transfusion of Christ's blood. The perpetual memorial of the great fact is instituted. "This is my blood of the new testament, which is shed for many." (Mark 14:24.)

Silk for Coronation Garment

MINUTE, extensive, and generous preparations are being made for the coronation of the Emperor of Japan next November. The Imperial Household Department procured from the Sansyusha at Okazaki in Aichi prefecture three kan of the best raw silk, with which the ceremonial dress of the Emperor at the coronation will be now on the hundreds of millions of the people of the world, so nearly democratic in their views. There is no authority even among rulers that amounts to much which does not come from wisdom, love, and devotion to the interests of the humblest subject of the realm. The limiting of the Japanese monarchy by the Mikado's father has made a singularly loyal people and dominant nation. There is this account of the formal coronation of the king's son as monarch: "And he brought forth the king's son, and put the crown upon him, and gave him the testimony; and they made him king, and anointed him, and they clapped their hands and said, God save the king." (II Kings 11:12.)

Tree 249 Years Old

MALDEN, Mass., lost one of its antiquities the other morning when the stump of the Dexter Elm, 249 years old, was uprooted from its place at No. 7 Elm Street, and cast into the dump heap. The stump, weighing eight tons, was all that remained of the venerable tree, which was killed two years ago by the leopard moths. In 1666 the first Richard

Dexter planted the tree. According to the family records, which were recently unearthed, Washington, in passing through Malden in 1775, tied his horse to the elm while he was calling at the Dexter house. City Forester Gould made an examination of the trunk when the last cut was made in it. He discovered that the largest ring growth occurred during the first eighty years of its life, and that the greatest general growth took place in the first 148 years. The elm looked down on the birth and death of between seven and eight generations. Oh, what stories it could tell, if it had lips and language! Trees were much in evidence in rural life in Bible times, and were used as an illustration in the message of the World-Teacher. The removal of the worthless tree is thus referred to: "And now also the ax is laid unto the root of the trees; therefore every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire." (Matt. 3:10.)

Homer's Probable Birthplace

CHIOS, where a torpedo boat the other day was destroyed, is the most probable birthplace of Homer, and shows the blind bard's cradle, schoolhouse, and tomb. Of the twelve cities which claimed the Homer dead, through which the living Homer begged his bread, it is generally believed that Chios deserves the immortal honor. Although almost exterminated by the terrible massacre of 1822, the people of Chios are the most prosperous in the Levant. Nearly all leading Greek bankers and merchants hail from this island. The intellectual genius of the past reached its climax in Homer. Of few men who have ever lived can it be more truly said: "He being dead yet speaketh." (Heb. 11:4.)

A Sermon to Fathers

REV. CHARLES E. JEFFERSON, D.D., LL.D., has an ideal sermon to fathers in the October number of the Woman's Home Companion. In it, among other things, he says: "In the earlier years children can be controlled by their mother, but by and by there comes a time when they begin to note the conduct of the father. No eyes are keener than the eyes of a child. If his father does not pray, prayer must be unnecessary. Grown men surely know what is needed. If his father never reads the Bible, then the big book can be dispensed with. Fathers know what books are most worth reading. If he does not go to church, then church attendance is a pastime and not a duty, for men so old and wise as fathers is would not neglect church if church were of value to them. If he never talks of God or Christ, or the Holy Spirit, if he shows no interest in the Bible or church or Christian work, the inference is clear and certain that religion is not a vital part of human life. It is not what the children are told from time to time, but what they see in the lives of their parents from day to day which makes the deepest impression on their characters. What is the greatest fortune a man can leave his children? A bag of gold? No. An honorable name? No. The best of fortunes is a parental example which makes it easy to believe in the fatherly goodness of God. The crowning achievement of a man on earth is to make the word 'father' so rich in memories and associations that it brings God nearer to his children, and opens for them the gates of heaven." Dr. Jefferson took this text for his sermon: "I will do you, fathers, because you have known Him that is from the beginning." (I John 2:13.)

The Church That Came Back

HOW a church went to a far country after Mammon had given to it the portion of goods that was coming to it; how it filled itself with the husks; and how it arose and came back, not to Mammon, but to the service of God and man, is told in a vivid, convincing way in "The Confessions of a Clergyman," published anonymously by McBride, Nast & Co., New York.

"THE Church of St. Croesus" is the nonce-name of an edifice and a congregation that the reader divines is located in the fashionable district of, say, Chicago. Let us read the description of the building:

"It seemed to me that St. Croesus had crawled up the red and blue arabesque of his slate roof, seated himself close to the costly bronze filigree along its skyline, and was shouting at the top of his lungs, 'Say! Ain't I the wealthy article? Look me up in Bradstreet's.' . . . I noticed an elaborate creation in Tiffany glass where Jesus was pictured at his workbench, toiling with saw and plane. What distressed me was not the incongruity—there, of all places. What distressed me was the soft, weak, sweet-sixteenish face some effeminate artist had bestowed upon the Carpenter. It was not the face of the Victor Messiah, all-conquering and regnant, Son of God and Son of Man. It was the form of a wax Madonna—plus whiskers! . . .

"I understood, now, what ailed a church that could tolerate that pink candy caricature of Jesus. Its religion, so-called, was a kind of esthetic sentimentalism. . . . It was a mythology rather than a religion; and nobody lets his mythology interfere with dividends or stockjobbing or rebating . . . or with a seat among the good Bohemians at 'The Follies of Nineteen-now.' . . .

"I was unable to conquer a burning, wriggling curiosity about my predecessor in the see of St. Croesus, and one day . . . I trotted down town to pick up a volume of sermons he had published. . . . Funny enough sermons they were . . . a little Ruskin, a little Emerson, a little Stevenson, a passage or two from Shelley or Keats, and . . . a politely worded hint that, strange though it might seem, 'this might hold true even in religion.' No wonder the parish could tolerate that blasphemous stained-glass caricature of Jesus!"

The Church of St. Croesus had moved uptown as soon as the inheritance of Mammon had been divided unto it—had moved to get away from the encroaching slums. The new pastor had a natural curiosity to know the history of the church.

"So I pumped the cook, who had lived there ever since she 'came over' and would perhaps know a thing or two about the Central's history. That was its name officially. Only scoffers like myself spoke of 'St. Croesus'. . . . It was the old story—a downtown church moved uptown. If I cared to, though she guessed I wouldn't, I could go and take a look at the original Central at the corner of Livingston and Greene streets. She dropped the subject there, as cheerfully as if it had been as much cut glass. I fancied I knew why. So, to the corner of Livingston and Greene Streets I went that evening, and Gertrude with me. . . .

"Over the way loomed a bulky red brick meetinghouse, steepleless now, and with the legend in electric lights above its Norman entrance, 'Flinn's Garden Theater.' . . . I said to Gertrude, 'This can't be it—it's outrageous! Kate must have told us wrong.'

"A girl was coming toward us at the moment. Gertrude stopped her and asked her if that was the Central Church."

The girl's reply was satisfactory as to fact, but was couched in language that can not be reproduced in a family weekly.

" . . . Neither of us spoke till we got back into civilization. Then Gertrude said to me: 'It's just possible that when that girl was a baby, the minister of the Central Church held her in his arms and baptized her into the name of the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit.' . . .

"Gertrude! Don't! I blurted. 'I can't bear it!' . . . 'We've got the wrong name for our church,' I said. 'From now on, let's call it St. Lucifer's.'"

THE pastor learns the story of the Exodus from the land of the Egyptians. "Suppose, to begin with, a land not in the least Egyptian. Cleanly, tree-shaded avenues lined with mansions representing entire decorum and respectability . . . an atmosphere of plain living only a little modified by wealth. . . . In the midst of it the Central. . . . A minister preaching Keats and Shelley, a congregation putting up with him because they liked him personally and gradually getting educated down to his level. . . . Next, a new railroad pushing through about six blocks west of the Central. Then . . . wild foreigners attracted by the depreciation in real estate. . . . It is not pleasant to look out from one's rear windows upon Syrians and Greeks, or to have the squaws of Asia Minor waddle past one's abode balancing lumberpiles on their heads. . . . Three blocks still separate the Central from Egypt. But the mischief has been done. Quack doctors, card readers, players on wind instruments make their entrance, respectability its exit. The faithful flee from an Egypt smitten with ten plagues at once. . . . Against the grain and in the face of considerable opposition, the Central at least resolves to pull up stakes. . . .

"I TOOK for my text the words: 'This night thy soul shall be required of thee.' . . . While I was speaking I looked up and saw the candy-pink caricature of Jesus in stained glass, and anger surged within me. I burst out about Mariolatry. I said the world had substituted a bearded Madonna for Jesus—that this was why it could think of him as a myth apart, and sentimentalize over his gospel without dreaming of applying it. . . . It was a terrible sermon. Hell—new style. But it ended with a call: 'Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.'

"And now I suppose you are asking what came of that sermon. Results?"

"Mrs. Edgar Williams said I was 'splendid—almost like Oberammergau.' Miss Ainsworth said I was 'so simple and primitive,' reminding her of 'those darling Fra Angelicos in the National Gallery.' Mrs. Ellis said I 'ought to write plays,' I had 'such a wonderful imagination. . . .

MRS. GILDER got me going by a rather exceptionally vehement scold about the 'move,' and I was rash enough to tell her of our visit to Livingston and Greene Streets . . . and about the poor harlot who 'might have been baptized there,' as Gertrude had said. Mrs. Gilder turned crimson and exclaimed hotly, 'Would you remember the girl if you should see her again? You find the girl, and I'll see that she's taken care of.'

"At that I felt a blush way up to the roots of my hair. Why had we let the poor thing slip through our fingers? Had we 'moved' too? Was I nothing but a kid-gloved 'metropolitan divine' after all?"

"Then began our prowls through Livingston Street. The Central could still make some feeble amends for the 'move.' Why not a mission chapel? Or a settlement? Or both? . . .

"One evening along in November, when Captain Michael Lafferty of the Eighth Precinct had agreed to talk over conditions in the district, I went down to Livingston Street alone. It was on the whole an encouraging view I got from the captain. He said the neighborhood had been maligned; that it contained irresponsibles enough, but sure, but that they had good sides in them and rarely gave trouble. He thought, however, that they were under harmful influences, mainly because of Flinn's Garden Theater. Bounce in and the district would pick up. 'Flinn isn't doing well. He tells me business is on the blink. He'd unload any day. Just you drop in on him as you buy. Ask him his figure. It'll surprise you folks.' . . .

"I glanced in through the old-fashioned Norman entrance. At that moment two ushers rushed out, dragging a girl with them. . . .

"I could break your heart with an account of those three weeks at Mrs. Gilder's. There were moments when Maggie was delirious and cried for her dead mother. There were moments when she cursed Mrs. Gilder and Gertrude and the nurse and the doctor and me. And there were moments when Scripture texts mingled with her babblings. . . .

"Then, one morning I shall never forget, the change came. Say: you like about the futility of death and repentances. This was real. At that moment she was going to get well. . . .

"Perhaps it was the illness more than the inner change that accounted for it, but before the end of the second week I could glance from Maggie's face to Gertrude's and defy anybody to guess that our patient had ever been an invalid but good all her life. . . .

THE Maggie episode was the occasion of the exodus of a goodly number of the respectable members of St. Croesus who wondered what the pastor was trying to make of the church—a Jaldalen's Home?

"The following week we had a social. Early in the evening ex-Senator Adams remarked, 'I hear old Barclay Adams is coming to church next Sunday with the idea of joining us if he likes the minister.'

"Yes?" said I, well knowing what was to follow.

"Well," the ex-Senator proceeded, 'you see, Adams is sensitive. No more, exactly, but—'

"You mean he wouldn't resh a sermon like last Sunday's."

"Now don't misunderstand me," the politician protested. 'I don't mean to criticize. For my part, I thought you handled a delicate subject remarkably well. It was inspiring. I repeat—'

That Old-Time Home O' Mine

AH ME! I'm gettin' hungry jest to go back home again;
I can see the old scenes loomin' up as clearly now as then;
I can peer along the vista of a score of years or more,
And the golden sun's a-shinin' down as in the days of yore!

I can see the dear old faces, I can hear their laughin' tone,
Just like I ust to hear 'em in the summers long since flown;
And my heart leaps high with rapture, while a thrill runs down my spine,
When I think onct more o' goin' to that old-time home o' mine!

Let me eat again the victuals that I ate in boyhood's days;
There's nothin' now tastes half so well, though cooked in stylish ways;
Oh, what a splendid relish, just a bowl of milk and bread,
And my mother standin' by me with her hand upon my head!

Let me sleep beside the window where the morning glories grew,
And the sun in golden patchwork at the dawning glinted through;
Making me to dream so grandly, as the years should onward roll,
Of my course of future greatness—how it thrilled my boyish soul!

I'm so sorry that my waking years this path have never known;
That upon my years of struggle small success has ever shone;
But it makes the harvest sweeter, though the fruit be gnarled and rare,
Just to know we've dreamed of heaven, and have had our standards there!

Let me wander in the woodlands where I loved in youth to tramp,
A-buildin' airy castles like Aladdin with his lamp,
Where the birds that sang above me and the flowers that bloomed beside Were like sermons preached from heaven with a message glorified!

They tell us now in science that the flowers all bloom for seed,
And the birds that sing around us simply call their mates, indeed!
But I love the old-time notion that my mother taught to me,
That the birds are minstrels praising God in field and bush and tree!

I've lingered long away from home, I've lived midst other men;
I've passed along the highway where I ne'er may walk again;
But I'd give a chunk of heaven just as big as I could hold,
With a brace or two of angels and a pavement made of gold,

Just to take old Time's machinery without a break or shock,
And turn its wheels all backward as a man would turn a clock;
Till the old days came upon me with a swish of glory rare,
And the long forgotten faces shone around me everywhere!

And I wonder, up in heaven, where it's awful nice and fine,
All burnished up in glory that'll far the sun outshine,
If the Lord who loves his children hasn't somewhere in the skies,
Just such a blest arrangement for their rapture and surprise!

CHAPTER I

THE tiny, trivial touch of Destiny that caused the turn in Amarilly's fate-tide came one morning when, in her capacity as assistant to the scrub ladies at the Barlow Stock Tater, she viewed for the first time the dress rehearsal of "A Terrible Trial." Before the patient little plodder had found in her occupation only the sordid satisfaction of drawing her wages, but in the resplendent costumes, the tragic in the gestures of the villain, the liquid grace of Lord Algernon, and the haughty treble of the leading lady, she saw the spark that fired ambition in her sluggish breast.

"Oh!" she gasped in wistful-voiced soliloquy, as she leaned against her mop-sweep and gazed aspiringly at the stage, "wonder if I couldn't rise!"

"Sure thing, you kin!" derisively cried Pete Noyes, vender of gum at the tinies. "I'll speak to de maniger, 'Mebby he'll let youse scrub de galleries."

Amarilly, case-hardened against railings by reason of the possession of a multitude of young brothers, paid no heed to the bantering scoffer, but resumed her work in dogged dejection.

"Say, Mr. Vedder, Amarilly's stage-sick!" called Pete to the ticket-seller, who chanced to be passing.

The gray eyes of the young man thus addressed softened as he looked at the still, eager face of the youngest sibber.

"Stop at the office on your way out, Amarilly," he said kindly, "and I'll give you a pass to the matinee this afternoon."

Amarilly's young heart fluttered wildly and sent a wave of pink into her cheeks as she voiced her gratitude. She was the first to enter when the doors opened that afternoon, and she lit close to the heels of the usher.

"He ain't a-goin' to give me the slip," she thought, keeping wary watch of his form as he slid down the aisle.

In the blaze of light and glare of instruments she scarcely recognized her workaday environment.

"House sold out!" she muttered with professional pride and enthusiasm as the signal for the raising of the curtain was given. "Mebby I'd orter give up my act so as they could sell it."

There was a moment's conflict between the little scrubber's conscience and her newly awakened desires.

"I ain't a-goin' to, though," she decided. And having so determined, she gave her conscience a shove to the reddest background, yielding herself to the full enjoyment of the play.

The rehearsal had been inspiring and awakening, but this, "the real thing," Amarilly appraised it, bore her into and of enchantment. She was blind and deaf to everything except the scenes acted on the stage. Only once was her sionate attention distracted, and it was when Pete in passing gave her emphatic nudge and a friendly grin as he munificently bestowed upon her package of gum. This she instantly eketed "fer the chillern."

At the close of the performance Amarilly sailed home on waves of excitement. She was the eldest of the five of Jenkins, whose scions, numbering eight, were all wage-earners save the baby. After school hours Amarilly was a district messenger, she milked the grocer's cow, Milton worked in a shoe-shining establishment, Bobby and Bud had paper routes, while Cory, commonly called "Co," wiped shoes at a boarding-house. Notwithstanding all these contributions to the family revenue, it became a sore struggle for the widow of Americanus Jenkins to feed and clothe such a numerous brood, so she sought further means of income.

"I've took a boarder!" she announced gleefully to Amarilly on her return from the theater. "He's a switchman and I'm a-goin' to fix up the attic fer him. I don't jest see how we air a-goin' to manage about feedin' him. 'Thar's no room to the table now, and 'thar ain't dishes enough to go round, but you're so contrivin' like, I thought you might find out a way."

Memories of the footlights were temporarily banished upon hearing this wonderful intelligence. A puzzled pucker came between the brows of the Cory. This outer row, Amarilly explained, was to be fed from the plates of their elders with food convenient as was Elijah by the Scriptural ravens. This plan lifted the strain from the limited table appointments, but met with opposition from the outpost, who rebelled against their stations.

"I ain't a-goin' to stand behind Flam or Gus," growled Milton. "I won't stand no show fer grub at all."

"I ain't, neither," and "Nit fer me!"

and Bud and Bobby, stand back of Flamingus and Gus. If they don't divvy up even they'll hev to change places with you. Now, to places!"

This conciliatory arrangement proving satisfactory, supper was served on the new plan with numerous directions and admonitions from Amarilly.

"No self-helpin's, Milt. Bud, if you knock Flammy's elbow, he needn't give you anything to eat. Bobby, if you swipe another bite from Gus, I'll spank you. Co, quit yer self-reachin's! Flammy, you hev got to pass everything to the Boarder fust. Now, every meal that I don't hev to speak to one of youse in the back row, youse kin hev merlasses spread on yer bread."

The rehearsal supper finished and the kitchen "red up," Amarilly's thoughts again took flight and in fancy she winged her way toward a glorious future amid the glow and glamour of the footlights. To the attentive family, who hung in an ecstasy of approval on her vivid portrayal, she graphically described the play she had witnessed, and then dramatically announced her intention of going on the stage when she grew up.

"You kin do it fine, Amarilly," said the mother admiringly.

"And we-uns kin git in free!" cried Bobby jubilantly.

In the morning the Boarder, a pleasant-voiced, quiet-faced man with a look of kindness about his eyes and mouth, made his entrance into the family circle. He commended the table arrangements, praised the coffee, and formed instantaneous friendships with the children. All the difficulties of the cuisine having been smoothed over or victoriously met, Amarilly went to the theater with a lightened heart. When Mr. Vedder came up to her and asked how she had enjoyed the performance, she felt emboldened to confide to him her professional aspirations.

The young ticket-seller did not smile. There was nothing about this diligent, ill-fed, little worker that appealed to his sense of humor.

"It will be a long time yet, Amarilly, before you can go on the stage," he counseled. "Besides, you know the first thing you must have is an education."

Amarilly sighed hopelessly. "I can't git to go to school till the boys hev more larnin'. I hev to work here mornin's and help ma with the washin's in the arternoon. 'Mebby, arter a little, I kin git into some night-school."

A stage-hand working near by overheard this conversation and displayed instant interest in the subject of Amarilly's schooling.

"Couldn't you git off Saturday arternoons?" he asked.

"Yes, I could do that," assured Amarilly eagerly. "Is 'thar a Saturday arternoon school?"

"Yes," replied the man. "There is a church guild, St. Mark's, that has a school. My little gal goes. She larns sewin' and singin' and waitin' on table and such like. You'd better go with her tomorrow."

"I kin sew now," said Amarilly, repeating this conversation to the family circle that night, "and I'd like to sing, 'fer of course I'll hev to when I'm on the stage, but I git enough waitin' on table to hum. I'd ruther larn to read better fust of all."

"I ain't much of a scholar," observed the Boarder modestly, "but I can larn you readin', writin', and spellin' some, and figurin' too. I'll give you lessons evenin's."

"We'll begin now!" cried the little tyro enthusiastically.

The Boarder approved this promptness, and that night gave the first lesson from Flamingus's schoolbooks.

The next morning Amarilly proudly informed the ticket-seller that her little would-be prima donna and remained there until at last the exigency was triumphantly met.

"I hev it, ma! When's he comin'?"

"Tomorrer 'fer breakfast."

"Then we must rayhearse tonight afore we kin put it on right. Come, all you-uns, to the kitchen table."

The Jenkins children, accustomed to the vernacular of the profession, were eager to participate in a rehearsal, and they scampered boisterously to the kitchen precincts. Amarilly, as stage director, provided seats at the table for herself, her mother, Flamingus, Gus, the baby, and the Boarder, the long-suffering, many-voiced family cat personating the latter as understudy. Behind their chairs, save those occupied by the Boarder and the baby, were stationed Milton, Bobby, Bud, and chorused the near twins, Bobby and Bud.

"I want to set at the table and eat like folks!" sobbed Cory.

Mrs. Jenkins advocated immediate surrender, but the diplomatic little general, whose policy was pacification, in shrill, appealing voice reassured and wheedled the young mutineers back into the ranks.

"It's the only way we can take a boarder," she persuaded, "and if we git him, we'll hev more to eat than jest hot pertaters and bread and gravy. 'Thar'll be meat, fresh or hotted up, onct a day, and pie on Sundays."

The deserters to a man returned from their ignominious retreat.

"Now, Co, you stand behind me, and when you git tired, you kin set on half my chair. Milt, git behind ma,

On the Bowery Mission Farm

Where the Unemployed Are Trained to Till the Soil for a Living

By DR. JOHN G. HALLIMOND

THE reclamation of a man from a life of sin, and in the building up of a character, the one most essential thing, next to the grace of God is self-respect. And how can a man be self-respecting when he has not the means of earning a living, but is dependent upon others?

Bowery Mission convert is therefore quickly introduced to the Free Labor Bureau, where every effort is made to secure him a position. Since the bureau was organized eight years ago 27,493 such positions have been found for men. In the meantime temporary work is provided in the Mission Industries, and in the Labor Settlement, now at Tuckahoe, N. Y.

It has been the business of the Labor Bureau to cultivate a connection with the farming industry of the near-by state, and every year many men are sent out to such places. In the spring each of the year it has become the custom of many Eastern states farmers to visit the Mission, and from the out-work men assembled daily in the rooms of the Bureau, to pick out and take back home with them the men they need.

Although there is a vast amount of exasperation in many of the statements regarding the demand for farm help—such help, in a large proportion of cases, being in great demand only at certain seasons of the year—the experience of the Bowery Mission Free Labor Bureau has been that every year there are many farm jobs vacant that cannot be filled. There are many reasons for this: the difficulty of transportation, the poor inducements offered, the probability of the job being only a temporary one, the qualifications demanded suggesting an almost angelic person rather than an ordinary human being, and so on. The chief cause, however, of this discrepancy between the demand and the supply of farm labor has been that there are so few men that have had any farm experience, and the ordinary farmer rarely can afford to take an absolutely green hand. The Bowery Mission has, therefore, for years been desiring and praying for a farm which could be used as a training school in the rudiments of the farming industry, where out-of-work men could go, and in as short a time as possible gain that amount of knowledge and experience which would qualify them to take these vacant positions.

THE prayers have been answered. In January 4 of this year the Mission had placed at its disposal the beautiful Griffen farm, of about 300 acres at Yorktown Heights, Westchester County, New York. The farm is adapted in almost every particular to the carrying out of the objects the Mission had in view. The distance from the northern boundary of New York

Nothing to be had here but health and peace and Heaven-blessed toil:

City is about thirty miles with the cities of Yonkers, White Plains, Mount Vernon and New Rochelle in between, while the large towns of Peekskill, Ossining, and Tarrytown on the west, and Mount Kisco, New Bedford and others on the east, are all within easy distance, providing splendid markets for the produce of the farm.

The houses and farm buildings are located on a plateau 720 feet above sea level, affording a magnificent panoramic view of the surrounding country. There are two large dwelling houses, one the Davenport house, containing twenty-one rooms, and the other, the Griffen house, having twenty-six rooms. They are in fairly good repair, strongly built of timber hewn and sawed on the farm itself. The farm buildings consist of a modern garage and store-room, a large hay and feed barn, two wagon sheds, a cattle barn which has accommodated sixty head of cattle, a carpenter's shop, a blacksmith's shop, a vinegar press room, several poultry houses, providing accommodation for five thousand hens, pig pens, corn-cribs, and well houses.

There are at least seven apple orchards containing upwards of fifteen hundred trees. Many of these trees are old, and probably useless; others will need considerable and careful attention before they arrive at commercial productivity again; but at least one thousand trees are in comparatively good trim.

THE work during the eight months of this first year has been largely occupied in cleaning it up and getting it ready for future use. But the experience gained during that time warrants the Mission in believing that the prime purpose of the institution, viz., the qualifying of men for farm jobs by a few months' practical training and experience, is already accomplished. From twelve to twenty men have been continually employed, and a large proportion of them have passed on to permanent farm jobs. Neighboring farmers are already much interested, and visit the farm when they are in need of farm hands, and make their selection on the spot.

The Mission was fortunate enough to secure the services of Wellington E. Manning, a retired farmer of Toronto, Canada, as manager. Mr. Manning is a Christian gentleman, thoroughly interested in the scheme, and not only imparts to the men the education they need, but gives every attention to their spiritual welfare. Mr. James T. Hunt, the business manager of the Mission, has also, during the summer months, made his home on the farm, commuted to his work at the Mission, and thus formed the necessary link between the two institutions.

Every Sunday afternoon a meeting is held in the Griffen house, at which not only the men, but many residents of the neighborhood, meet for a stirring service, somewhat after the type of meeting held in the Bowery Mission.

Nothing therefore seems to stand in the way of the main purposes of the scheme being accomplished. First, the training-school for farming is already in operation. Even during the first eight months many men have been taught how to milk, plow, and harrow; they have, under the guidance of the manager, sown many acres of corn, potatoes, and all kinds of vegetables; they have also learned how to attend to horses, cattle, pigs, chickens and other live stock. They have been furnished with abundance of good wholesome food; they have had clean, comfortable beds to sleep on; they have been surrounded by a wholesome religious atmosphere, and there has not been a man who has not rejoiced in the experience.

In the stream which runs through the farm there is a very valuable waterfall, on which, until a few years ago, there stood a saw-mill, which was resorted to by a large section of the country for timber sawing. It was destroyed by fire some twelve years ago. It is the proposal of the Mission in course of time to utilize this fall of water for the production of electricity and light the houses and farm buildings by electric light.

ONE of the greatest difficulties in connection with the supply of farm help is the temporary, seasonal character of the jobs offered. In the rush of work at spring or harvest times farmers cry out for men. Then in the late fall and winter men are out of work, and throng into the cities. The Bowery Mission, in connection with its new farm, intends to show how men can be employed all the year round. The principal occupation during spring and summer months will be truck gardening, the products being taken in fresh early every morning by auto-truck into the city markets. In the fall will come the harvesting of the general farm crops. In the winter, wood-cutting will be the chief occupation. The growth of cord-wood on the mountain side of the farm will afford this kind of work for many years to come. It is also proposed to erect houses in which several men can be employed in winter.

The men will be expected to work steadily, but there will be no unduly long hours. They will have good food, healthy living conditions, adequate social advantages, and at all times an atmosphere of Christian fellowship.

The Bowery Mission is now one of the most complete converting and regenerating institutions in the world—its activities being all welded together in one complete chain; its Gospel Meetings, its Brotherhood, its Labor Bureau, its Mission Industries, its Labor Settlement, and its Farm.

A profitable corner of the new farm.

This beats a city street all hollow.

Our Mail-Bag

Convenience

THERE are three things about Crisco that make it convenient to use in the ordinary kitchen.

It can be kept in any part of the kitchen without becoming too soft or too hard—thus it saves valuable space in the refrigerator.

It keeps indefinitely without turning rancid.

It comes to a proper heat for frying without giving off any of the smoke that so often makes cooking an unpleasant process and leaves odors in the kitchen.

CRISCO
For Frying—For Shortening
For Cake Making

Crisco is a vegetable cooking fat. It is pure and easy to digest. It is made in a building in which it is never touched by hand, and never comes into contact with anything which might have germs or the least bit of dust or dirt.

Crisco is cheaper and more wholesome than the best of lard. It is in every way as good for cooking as the highest quality creamery butter, and costs but half as much.

Hurry Up Cake

- 1/2 cupful sugar
- 1 1/2 cupfuls flour
- 4 tablespoonfuls Crisco
- 1/2 teaspoonful almond extract
- 1/2 teaspoonful lemon extract
- 2 whites of eggs
- 1/2 teaspoonful salt
- 2 teaspoonfuls baking powder

(Use level measurements)

Sift flour, baking powder, salt and sugar into bowl. Put whites of eggs into measuring cup, add Crisco, and fill cup with milk. Add to dry mixture with extracts and beat vigorously six minutes. Pour into small Criscoed and floured cake tin and bake in moderate oven forty-five minutes. Cake may be frosted if liked. Sufficient for one small cake.

If you want to know more about Crisco and the conditions under which it is prepared, send for the "Calendar of Dinners". This cloth-bound, gold-stamped book contains, besides the story of Crisco, a different dinner menu for every day of the year and 615 recipes tested by the well-known cooking authority, Marion Harris Neal. Questions and Answers

The following letter explains itself:

Sept. 18, 1915.

Editor of The Christian Herald.

Dear Sir: Years ago, I wronged an old man in a trade. I do not remember his name, but I cheated him to the extent of five or ten dollars, and as I cannot make restitution to him I am sending you $30 (thirty dollars) in money and I want you to put it where you think such money should be put. I am not signing my name, but if you acknowledge receipt of it in the Christian Herald, I may be able to hear from it. My conscience is troubling me.

Restitution is a duty wherever it is practicable, and where circumstances make it impracticable—as in the present case, the next best thing to do is to devote to some good cause a sum equivalent to the amount wrongly acquired, together with interest. Zaccheus, who was probably a hard man at a bargain, told the Master that in cases where he had taken unlawfully he restored fourfold. Our unknown correspondent is following this example. For his sake we wish it were possible to reach the man he defrauded, but this, after the lapse of years, being out of the question, we shall apply the gift, with his approval, for the benefit of several old men, applicants for help at the Bowery Mission. The acknowledgment by the Mission will be published in this paper. We sincerely hope, now that he has done this act of justice, that his conscience will give him no more trouble on that account. He has done all he could, freely and voluntarily, to right the wrong.

B. M., Chillicothe. I read the words "and whensoever ye stand praying, forgive." In many cases this is an almost impossible—a superhuman thing. We may profess forgiveness of some grievous wrong, yet the injustice and wickedness of it will rankle in the heart for long years afterward. Is complete forgiveness possible? I mean in such extreme cases? While we may wish sincerely to forgive and yet find ourselves unable to do so, will God refuse us forgiveness because of this inability on our part to forgive another?

If we remember that our Saviour forgave even his murderers, and asked his Father to forgive them, pleading that they knew not what they did, our own grievances against others will seem very small. But whatever they may be, if we come to God in the right spirit, and plead with him that our hearts may be softened toward those who have injured us, our prayer will not be denied. Professor David Smith writes very helpfully on this subject. "Forgiveness," he says, "does not mean regarding the offender as though he were innocent. When one has wronged you and would wrong you again, the duty of forgiveness does not mean that you must feel no indignation, or treat him as though he were innocent. That is impossible, and, indeed, it would be a failure in moral duty. It means rather that you must harbor no thought of revenge, but on the contrary, avail yourself of every opportunity of requiting his evil with good. The test of your attitude is very simple, and it is this: If he repented and confessed his fault, would you welcome his approach and assure him of your willingness to bury the past and have done with it forever? This is God's way. It is related that Abraham entertained an aged and weary traveler in his tent, and, asking why he begged no blessing on his meat, learned that he was a three-worshiper, whereupon he thrust the old man out of his tent. God called to Abraham and asked where the stranger was. 'I thrust him out because he did not worship thee.' And God answered, 'I have suffered him these hundred years, and couldst not thou endure him one night?'"

F. M., Erin, N. Y. 1. Who organized the Episcopal Church, and when? 2. Was John Wesley, the founder of the Methodist Episcopal Church, an Episcopal clergyman? If so, did he ever leave that church? 3. Was the Methodist Episcopal Church a part of the Episcopal Church? If so, when was it separated?

It is hardly correct to speak of the "organization" of the Episcopal Church. Christianity was established in England in the early centuries of the Christian era, but with the gradual assumption of Roman supremacy the English Church became merely a part of the Roman Catholic Church. Henry VIII brought about the separation of the Church of England from the Papal Church at the time of the great Reformation throughout Europe. When the American colonies were founded the Church of England established churches here, but the Revolution made it necessary to separate the churches of the colonies from the mother church. So the Episcopal or Protestant Episcopal Church is the name of the American division of the Church of England. The name Episcopal means, of course, having bishops, so the Church of England is also called correctly the Episcopal Church. 2. Yes, John Wesley was a clergyman of the Church of England, and never left that body. 3. The Methodist Episcopal Church is only one branch of the Methodist movement organized and promoted by Wesley. Until almost the end of Wesley's life the members of his Methodist "societies" remained members of the established Church. But during the American Revolution, so many Methodist congregations were deprived of the sacraments and of the service of ordained ministers, and there was such an urgent demand for them, that Wesley, holding that one elder had authority to ordain another, ordained Thomas Coke to come to America and ordain other preachers here. Coke ordained Francis Asbury as elder and bishop, and the Methodists in America, recognizing the office of "bishop," took the name Methodist Episcopal Church. In England the Methodists are still called "Wesleyans," and in America there are other Methodist organizations besides the Methodist Episcopal, such as the Methodist Protestant, Primitive Methodist, Free Methodist, etc., none of them having bishops. In England, the Methodist societies were separated from the Church of England in 1791.

Unhappy Sister. You should not allow yourself to be burdened and hindered by regrets over the experiences to which you refer. It is very likely that your sister's mind was somewhat unbalanced by her troubles, and you must try to forget that last unpleasant year, remembering only the earlier delightful intercourse. There is little doubt that in her heart she remained true to you and now understands that the clouds that came between you were only imaginary. If you were not as patient as you think you might have been, do not grieve over it now. Such grief will unfit you for your best and most helpful service to those still around you. You may receive a great blessing from our heavenly Father which will make your heart gentle and kind; and, though we must sometimes resent and rebuke injustice, we may have always the attitude of helpfulness. What your sister would most earnestly desire now is that your mind might regain its peace, and that you make up for the sadness of the year of misunderstanding and the sorrow of separation by making every hour glad for those with whom you are now associated.

Miss E. S., Arkona, Canada. Should we not fast at times when we pray? I send these passages: Luke 2:37; Joel 2:15.

Fasting, which was a marked feature of the old dispensation, has come down to us from age to age and is found to some extent in the church at the present day. It cannot be denied that it has its merits, both spiritual and physical, and especially in great emergencies when it is desired to concentrate the spiritual faculties (either in individual cases, or as a community, or a nation). Besides, it cannot be forgotten that Jesus himself set the example. See Matt. 4:2. It is true, he did not specifically enjoin fasting upon his disciples, and he even rebuked the Pharisees for their frequent fasts; but the rebuke was because they gave more prominence to the formalism of the observance than to its spirit and purpose. (See Matt. 6:16-18; Matt. 17:21.)

Constant Reader. 1. The first century began January 1 of the year one and ended at the end of the first hundred years—i. e., December 31 of the year 100. The second century began January 1 of the year 101 and ended at midnight of December 31 of the year 200. Similarly the twentieth century began January 1, 1901, and will end December 31, 2000—i. e., when twenty centuries shall have been completed. 2. Don't know his denomination. 3. Pocantico Hills, Tarrytown, N. Y., and Cleveland, Ohio. 4. If he seeks forgiveness he should also pray to be kept from sin and for divine help to resist temptation. When the heart is regenerated and Christ comes into the daily life, sin ceases to have dominion over us. We must trust Him who has promised to keep us and who will not permit us to be tempted beyond our strength.

Here is a beautiful thought from a Southern friend.

"I visited New York recently and, while riding up Broadway, passed Grace Church when the chimes at noon were ringing out hymns. I got off the car and listened to the heavenly music and it gave me that peace of mind that God's people understand and enjoy. I wondered how many of that eager rushing throng heeded and enjoyed the soul-entrancing music. Since then I have thought of how we all, in our worldly pursuits, don't listen to and enjoy the echoes of those heavenly strains that surround us at all times. How deaf Christians are to the love and care of their heavenly Father, who is seeking them at all times. Not only will he relieve our cares and give us real joy and comfort, but he will keep us in that frame of mind that will enable us to do his will, thereby heeding our Saviour's command, to lay up treasure that will last for all eternity."

"J. KEMP WYSHAM."

Mrs. W. B. H., a reader in Newport, Ark., in a letter just received gives a vivid picture of the almost instantaneous transformation effected in that town by the recent floods. She writes: "A visitor to Newport a few weeks before the flood spoke of it as the 'hottest' place on the globe.

People were going to and fro, gramophones turned loose far into the night, the El was a blaze of glory till near morning, nejos and fiddles made night a nightmare trying to sleep. But one morning the broke: then the Iron Mountain dump, which was holding back the water, also broke, and the dump across Newport Lake gave way, sending the water over the town with such a rush and roar that families were cut off from each other in the streets as they hurried to their homes. People in autos were forced to abandon them in the streets; and neighbor pulled neighbor from the deep waters and led them to places of safety. People were made to feel their dependence upon God. Those who had not known their neighbors were thrown into buildings with them to spend the week; and where no community life had heretofore existed, a feeling of sympathy and good fellowship was engendered. Newport seems to have been fortunate in escaping without loss of life. After all, the flood seems to have brought its compensations, though those who suffered losses, and endured pain and discomfort, have our sympathy.

That the memory of the "good times" which our little tenement waifs enjoy at our Children's Home at Mont-Lawn is cherished long afterward is made evident from the many letters received from those who are old enough to write. Here is a letter—a sample of many others of the same kind—which the patrons of our Fresh Air work will read with pleasure: "I thank you for your kindness the eleven days, and for making my hair. I am lonesome at home and wish could go back to Mont-Lawn. I play school at home and play in the evening, but the country is so lonesome. I eat more at home now than I ever did. The country made me dress queerly at home. I sing my songs that I learned at Mont-Lawn. I hope the children obey the law and sing the hymns right. I was glad that had a good time, and I will never forget the Christian Herald Children's Home.—MARIE D.—New York."

Miscellaneous

Paul F., San Francisco. Never heard such a course as you mention.

W. B. G., Manville, Ill. We have no collection of the case you mention.

T. A. C., Carleton, Mich. While the provision to which you refer is not quite as far as the author intended, it is a mistake to conclude that he meant to uphold Universalism.

Victor, E. R., Dorchester, Mass. True is knowledge or information relative to doings, customs, or events, which has been handed down orally from generation to generation, and which has been so long and so universally accepted that it has attained the force of law.

M. F., Sr., Wood Bluff, Ala. The word "Christ" is the Greek equivalent of the Hebrew word Messiah, meaning "anointed." It word, both in the Old and New Testament, occurs almost without exception with the definite article, so the expression, as relating to the Messiah, means "The Anointed One."

Wisconsin Reader. Esperanto has made much progress in the last ten years; exactly how much it would be difficult to say on account of lack of accurate statistics. It has lost much of its interest in the last year on account of the war. The number of those who speak it in Europe is large, but there are less in the United States. It is looked upon favorably by leading educators in Europe and America. Before the war there were over a hundred periodicals published in the language.

A. A., Wernersville, Pa. The prophecy Isa. 17:1 regarding Damascus was fulfilled later years (see Jer. 49:24-25). Damascus remained a province of Assyria until the capture of Jehu by the Medes (B.C. 625), when it submitted to the conquerors, and its wealth and commercial importance greatly declined for a long period while its most influential and enterprising citizens were carried into captivity. It was afterwards held in succession by Egypt, Babylon and Persia, and has been torn down and rebuilt several times.

Reader, Arlington, Kan. The problem one concerning which we do not care to advise you. You know the Scripture teaching and the solemn law on the subject and how they conflict. It must therefore be very largely a matter of conscience. Meanwhile we have always held that where a person feels that his eternal welfare is at stake, his first duty is to God, and there is no human or divine, which can compel one to continue in a condition which has become tolerable, on both moral and spiritual grounds.

Inquirer, Newark, N. J. There are at present time over 800 orphan boys and girls in China, distributed in several mission orphanages, and are wholly dependent upon the Christian generosity of readers of this journal for support. The fund which is raised for these little folks is the basis, under Providence, of supplying all their needs: food, clothing and shelter, giving them a Christian education and training them for ultimate self support. The Christian Herald will welcome aid in this beautiful missionary work. Readers wishing to help these little Chinese should send their gifts to the Chinese Orphan Fund, care of this paper, Bible House, New York.

Sunrise on the Sea

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

IF you ever look at the ocean before sunrise when the first mist of the morning was rising grayly from a crest of dull foam in the distance? It's rather cold, cheerless sight, isn't it? The shades of color in the water—blue and green and drab—are all cold, unsympathetic colors, and they blend together in a cold, unsympathetic mass that stretches off mightily into the far, far distance.

And then, have you ever stood on the sea—a lonely atom of humanity here such vast untamed spaces, and watched the sun come up? Have you watched the clouds part softly, and the mist begin to creep stealthily away? Have you seen one glorious streak of gold color touch the dulness of the sea—first one, then another, and another, until the whole sea became a wonderful path of flaming color like the heart of a great full-blown rose?

Perhaps some of my girls have never seen this picture. Perhaps hundreds of them will never see this picture; but it's an easy thing to imagine it. No matter if you have never seen a drop of water larger than a puddle of indrops on the prairie or a panful of fishwater in the kitchen, you have probably seen that small body touched by a bit of sunshine and you have probably noticed how the first gleam of brightness that touched it faintly with green color spread until the whole surface glowed like molten metal.

THERE is a girl that I have known all my life—an auburn-headed girl with flashing dark eyes and an imperious way of raising her chin when she speaks to you. At one time she was known as rather haughty, self-satisfied little person, but somehow so gradually that no one realized what had wrought the change—she became transformed, and lonely girls went to her with their hatches, and discouraged girls went to her with their fears and struggles. She used to be known as "the girl with the awful temper," but now folk call her "that awfully understanding girl."

One day while I was talking to her about sympathy and affection it all came out. "I suppose you remember," she told me "how I used to be. I used to think I was rather nice—rather superior to the others. And well you know she's an old saying that red-headed girls are rather quick-tempered—well, I was more than rather quick-tempered. I red up at every little thing that in the least offended me—no matter how small it really was. And because I was so excited and cross, my life was rather gray-colored, for I had no very warm friendships and no very bright moments. I did not even realize why I was unhappy—I was too self-satisfied."

One day I was out at a picnic party with the girls in my class at school. I had on a new Tam o' Shanter cap that I had made myself, a pretty little affair that had taken only a few hours of my time. One of the girls—a new girl in town—the old girls would hardly have dared to speak of it!—came up to me and said wistfully:

"That's such a pretty hat—where did you get it? I've been trying for ages to find something like it."

"Some good impulse—an impulse that I seldom felt in those days—prompted me to unbend for a moment. 'Why,' I told her, 'I made it myself! It's very easy to do. Come to my house some afternoon this week, and I'll show you how.'"

"The girl was so pleased! Her plain little face—she wasn't a pretty girl—brightened up as if it was full of sunshine. 'I'd—I'd love to!' she said. 'you're so—good.' And then she hesitated before she spoke again. 'Do you mind,' she asked me, 'if I kiss you?' . . . Somehow the day of that picnic was the very pleasantest day that I ever spent in my life."

"That night, after I got home, I sat down and began to think—hard. And when I got down to brass tacks, as they say, I realized that doing one little kind thing had made my whole day—and, incidentally, my whole life—brighter."

"If," I said to myself, "if making a Tam o' Shanter hat for a girl will give me such a glow of happiness I ought to do something, even though it's something very little, every day to give some one pleasure."

"It wasn't easy for me at first. I'd gotten into the habit of being resentful when people asked me questions and pretended to want my advice. Lots of times I forgot my resolution; lots of times I didn't try to remember it. More times than any I didn't want to. But after I'd been trying for six months to say and do pleasant little things it began to come easy to me. I began to want to tell people that I liked them. I began to want to help the girls make their dresses, I became sympathetic in regard to their dreams and ambitions."

"That was two years ago. I'm different now, don't you think so? I don't think there's a girl in town that doesn't like me nearly as well as I like her. The girls who have always lived here seem to have forgotten what a stick I used to be, and the new girls never knew me when I was a stick. Does it sound conceited for me to say that I'm—I'm popular?"

THERE are a great many girls in the world who are popular, girls who don't dress well and haven't much money, girls who are painfully plain, girls who are not clever. They are popular because they have found that it makes them happier to help others; and in finding their own happiness and other people's happiness they have achieved a very beautiful result.

The ocean before the sun rises is not a prepossessing sight. There's only one thing it resembles, and that is the heart of a person that has never been touched by the sunlight of friendship and human kindness. Such a heart is cold and unsympathetic and gray-colored, too.

When the sun rises over the ocean and rests lightly on the waves there shows first a streak of gold, and then another and another until all the water is colored and radiant. Just so a heart that has been touched by the sunshine of one kind deed will glow with a bit of golden light, and the golden light will spread until every corner of that heart is glowing.

Unique Mosaic Map

ONE of the oldest and most unique maps in the form of a mosaic has recently been installed in the National Museum at Washington. It is a reduced reproduction in colors of a mosaic map of Palestine and part of Egypt. The original mosaic formed the floor of an old church in Medeba, a town in the former territory of Moab, situated almost directly east of Bethlehem, and often mentioned in the Old Testament. The mosaic itself, dating from the sixth century A. D., was discovered in 1882 when the site of the old ruined church was being cleared for the erection of a new church building. Unfortunately the mosaic floor was much damaged on that occasion by ignorant workmen before it was saved by the scientists. The part of the mosaic saved from destruction extends from Nablus, the Biblical Shechem, in the north, to the Nile delta of Egypt in the south.

The original mosaic, which is the earliest map of Palestine in preservation, the reproduction is described in Greek. It combines with geographical a picturesque illustration of the Bible and Christianity in Palestine. In fact, the artist seems to have been more intent on picturesque detail than on the geography. Unlike modern maps, the Medeba map is orientated not toward the north but toward the east, sunrise, so that places and legends are arranged on the west line. Cities and towns are represented by buildings, sometimes surrounded by palm trees. The Jordan is shown as a comparatively broad stream which falls into the Dead Sea, and the latter is agitated by currents represented by thick black streaks. The banks of the Jordan are connected by two bridges while on the surface of the Dead Sea two vessels are depicted. The mountains are designated in various tints to indicate their several strata. In the desert east of the Jordan a gazelle is represented as being pursued by some animal, possibly a lion or a panther.

This interesting reproduction was acquired by Mr. Woodward in Jerusalem while he was on a tour around the world in the interest of the Christian Missions in 1899. Smithsonian Institution Bulletin

Young People's Topics for October 17

The Responsibility of Our Society for Local, State, and National Unions
Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic. Ps. 133: 1-3

THE other day I was surprised to read this: "The great Welsh revival, the most glorious and far-reaching outpouring of the Holy Spirit in this generation, started with the earnest testimony of a young girl in a Christian Endeavor prayer meeting. All she said was: 'Oh, I do so love Jesus!' and then she sat down. All Christendom is still feeling the blessed effects of the scenes that followed."

I do not know how trustworthy that bit of history is, but know no reason to doubt it. If that little Welsh girl could by her spontaneous truthful testimony set all of Wales on fire for God, what might the young people of the American Christian Endeavor Societies and Baptist Young People's Unions do if they would receive God's grace in full measure into their hearts and testify to it with glad lips!

That, then, is your first responsibility to your local union—to see that you help to give your own society the right spiritual tone that shall make it a blessing to the community. Then see to it, in all your relations with the larger unions, that spiritual interests are kept uppermost.

Here are a few practical suggestions: Try to insist upon having your society and all the unions you come in touch with actually controlled by the young people, not by older folks, and not too predominantly by the ministers. The young people's societies are a democracy, and their plan is to give the young people practical experience and practical responsibilities in Christian work. Be willing to lead, be willing to follow, to take responsibility or to obey others. (Look up the lesson study for last week.) If you can attend union conventions, keep eyes, ears and heart alert and open to bring back the usable material of the convention. Get the thrill of feeling that you are one of a great army; keep in touch with it; share its dreams and its daring and its faith. Remember that every society is made up of young persons just like you, and that every union is made up of societies just like yours. Lastly, then, as at first, think again of that little Welsh girl who set a nation on fire by saying in her Christian Endeavor prayer meeting: "Oh, I do so love Jesus!"

Can We Capture Politics for God?

Epworth League Topic. Ps. 33: 8-22

THIS is a dangerous subject. We blame our Catholic friends for trying to take their religion into politics.

Among the Workers

OMAHA, Nebraska, has been having its long expected Billy Sunday campaign. The tabernacle held from eight to ten thousand people, and 1200 in the choir, and all the usual features of preliminary organization work were employed. Results at Omaha are reported as fully up to the high mark set by the great campaigns in the East which ended at Paterson this spring. Interest has been intense, and the evangelist secured the enthusiastic support of the churches in his leadership. Though Mr. Sunday's party has changed somewhat in its personnel, the tremendous power of his earnest personality is the same, and the message he is delivering is unchanged in its directness, simplicity and get-to-it-iveness. Coming eastward from his Summer's rest by the roundabout route of the Panama Pacific Exposition, where he conducted revival services, Mr. Sunday faces perhaps the greatest opportunity of his remarkable career—an opportunity which will be shared in by every evangelist who has received a vision of the needs of the time and a message from on high.

THE Home Mission Monthly for October in a leading article "By a Citizen of Utah" says: We are convinced that neither Mormon theology nor Mormon autocracy can long stand against the keen scrutiny of modern education. But do not be deceived. The Mormon problem has not yet been solved. Whether Mormonism can ever be transformed into a pure form of Christianity remains to be seen. How such a barbaric religion can be transformed is beyond the comprehension of man's mind, yet what right have we to question the limits of Divine power?

We complain if the religion of a political candidate enters into the campaign. We complain when some political organization like the Prohibition or Socialist parties insist that Christians should support them in their moral and economic reforms. We condemn the churches of Europe for apportioning their national military organizations and campaigns. Now, with all these things in mind, we are asked to consider the question: "Can we capture politics for God?"

And the answer, in spite of all the objections above stated, clearly is: "We should surely try to do so."

But how? What does it mean to capture politics for God?

It means this: We have an open Bible; every one of us has a conscience; we may seek a personal religious experience which will bring us into intimate personal relationship with the Holy Spirit, who has promised to guide all who trust and follow him. Now, as we compare what we learn from the Bible, from conscience, from the Holy Spirit, with what we see in the social organism of which we are a part, we know that that organization is terribly wrong. It is most clearly our duty to help make it right. We must try to bring its laws and customs into conformity with what we believe to be the will of God.

Only last week we had occasion in this department to quote the prize definition of a Christian as decided by the editors of a great popular magazine: "An actual Christian is one who in individual concerns sincerely tries to practice the Christian ideal, and in common affairs sincerely tries to convert to the Christian ideal the social organism of which he is a part."

Social conditions are controlled, in a democracy, by politics, politics being the method and the machinery by which the will of the people is turned into law and administration. A Christian, then, must take his religion into politics. He must vote as he prays. He must vote for the men and measures he believes will make society most nearly conform to what he knows to be right.

But can politics be "captured" for God? That is a large order. Yet that also is the divine promise and the divine command.

Peace, justice, brotherhood, cooperation—these things must be made facts instead of dreams. And the actual instrument for turning these dreams into facts is, of course, not the bullet but the ballot.

Christian young people should study economics. Many of them should go into politics. They should stand and work and vote together to help answer their own prayers. They should determine that the laws of man be made to tally with the laws of God.

At the critical age of middle life

To grow old gracefully. This is the hope of every man and woman at the critical age of middle life. To keep the mind fresh, the body active—to keep from too-early "slowing up" with the weight of advancing years—to be able to resist the attack of disease with the same certainty as in younger days—this is the hope of the middle-aged.

And here the kindly help of Sanatogen brings most gratifying results. Embodying purest albumen and organic phosphorus, Sanatogen is easily assimilated into the system; it feeds the depleted cells and tissues, restores energy, reawakens the appetite, and strengthens the organism so that it is better able to withstand the inroads of disease.

Many indeed are those who, after using Sanatogen, the food-tonic, can say with John Burroughs, the venerable naturalist:

"My sleep is 50 per cent. better than it was a year ago, and my mind and strength are much improved."

Or with the Hon. Wm. F. Chandler, former Sec'y of the Navy, who writes:

"Sanatogen is a pleasant nutriment for cases of impaired digestion. It strengthens without irritating and promotes vitality in feeble folks."

Famous men and women almost without number have given grateful praise for the restorative aid of Sanatogen, and over 21,000 physicians—after watching it in their daily practice—have written expressing their belief in Sanatogen. To guard against the pitfalls of advancing years, Sanatogen can be helpful also to you.

action had begun. She was consequently rather lukewarm in regard to the school proposition, but the little laughter of the stagehand pictured the school and her teacher in most enticing fashion.

"Kin be in our class," she coaxed sively. "We hev a new teacher. She's a real swell and wears a diamond ring and her hair is more yaller than the wig that the play lady wears. She hed up to her house to a supper last week and thar was velvet carpets and ice-cream and lots of cake but no pic."

Amarilly's curiosity was aroused, and her roughened hand firmly grasped the guiding one of her little companion. She permitted herself to be led to the Guild school.

CHAPTER II

THE teacher at the Guild was even more beautiful than Amarilly's fancied by the little girl's vivid description, had pictured.

"Her hair ain't boughten," decided the on-eyed critic as she gazed admiringly at the golden braids crowning the maid. The color of her eyes was open to speculation: when they had faded from gray to green, from green to hazel, and from hazel to purple, Amarilly gave up the enigma. The color of her complexion changed, too, in varying tints of peaches.

"To believe she ain't got no make-up!" declared Amarilly wonderingly.

The little daughter of the stage-hand had overappraised the diamond. It shone resplendent on a slender, shapely hand.

"Miss King, I've brung a new scholar," introduced the little girl importantly. "She's Amarilly."

She glanced at her new pupil, the young teacher's eyes brightened with spontaneous interest, and a welcoming smile parted her lips.

"I'm glad to see you, Amarilly. Her a nice little pile of blue carpet rag, sew and make into a ball. When you've made a lot of balls I'll have them woven into a pretty blue rug for you to take home and keep."

"For the Boarder's room!" thought Amarilly joyously, as she went at her work with the avidity that marked all her undertakings.

Presently a small seamstress asked for instruction as to the proper method of stitching the strips together. The fair face of the young teacher became clouded for a moment, and she was unmistakably confused. Her wavering, dubious glance fell upon Amarilly sitting tenacious and upright as she made quick, forcible, and effective stabs with her needle, biting her thread vigorously and resolutely. The stitches were microscopic and even; the strips symmetrically and neatly joined.

The teacher's face cleared as she saw and sized her avenue of escape.

"You may all," she directed, "look at Amarilly's work and sew the strips just as she does. Hers are perfect."

Amarilly's wan little face brightened, and she proceeded to show the children how to sew, bringing the same ease and effectiveness into her tutoring that she displayed when instructing her brothers and ory.

The sewing lesson continued for an hour. Then the children sang songs to a piano accompaniment, and there followed a lesson in cooking and the proper setting of a table. All this instruction was succeeded by an informal class.

"Want you all to tell me what you are going to do when you grow to be women," said Miss King.

In most cases the occupations of their parents were chosen, and the number of washerwomen, scrubbers, and seamstresses in embryo was appalling.

"Did you, Amarilly?" she asked, addressing the new pupil last of all.

Amarilly's mien was lofty, her voice confidential, as she replied in dramatic declamation:

"I'm goin' on the stage!"

The young teacher evinced a most eager interest in this declaration.

"Oh, Amarilly! We all have a stage-longing period. When did you first think of such a career?"

"I'm in the perfectshun now," replied Amarilly pompously.

"Really! Tell me what you do, Amarilly."

"I scrub at the Barlow Theatre, and I went to the matinee day afore yesterday. I hed a pass give to me."

These statements made such a visible impression on her audience that Amarilly waxed eloquent and proceeded to describe the play, warning to her work as she gained confidence. The gestures of Lord Algernon and the leading lady were reproduced freely, fearlessly, and faithfully.

With a glimmer of mischief dancing in her eyes, the young teacher listened appreciatively but apprehensively as she noted the amazed expression on the faces of the teachers of adjacent classes when Amarilly's treble tones were wafted toward them. Fortunately, the realistic rendering of Lord Algernon's declaration of love was interrupted by the accompaniment to a song, which was followed by the dismissal of the school.

"Kin I take my strips home to sew on?" asked Amarilly.

"Oh, no!" replied Miss King. "That is not permitted."

Seeing the look of disappointment in the child's eyes, she asked in kindly tone:

"Why are you in such a hurry to finish the work, Amarilly?"

"We've took a Boarder," explained Amarilly, "and I want the rug fer his room. It'll take an orful long time to git it done if I only work on it an hour onet a week. He's so good to me, I want to do something to make his room look neat, so he'll feel to him."

The young teacher reflected a moment.

"I'll tell you what we'll do, Amarilly. I will buy one of the rugs that are to be on sale at the church fair this week. They have some very nice large ones. I will give it to you, and when yours is finished you may give it to me in return."

"Oh, thank you!" cried Amarilly, her countenance brightening. "But won't you need it afore I kin git this one done?"

"No; I am sure I shall not," replied the young lady gravely.

When they left the building the teacher paused as she was about to step into her electric brougham.

"Where do you live, Amarilly?"

Amarilly gave her street and number. "You must live farther away than any of the other children. Get in, dear; I will take you home."

She had opened the door as she spoke, and the little scrubber's eyes were dazzled by the elegance of the appointments—a silver vase filled with violets, a silver cardcase, and—but Amarilly resolutely shut her eyes upon this proffered grandeur and turned to the lean but longing little daughter of the stage-hand.

"You see, I come with her," she explained simply and loyally.

"There is room for you both. Myrtle can sit on this little seat."

Overawed by the splendor of her environment, Amarilly held her breath as they glided swiftly through the streets. There was other glory, it seemed, than that of the footlights. When the happy little Myrtle had been left at her humble home the young teacher turned with eager anticipation to Amarilly.

"Tell me more about yourself, Amarilly. First of all, who is the Boarder?"

Amarilly explained their affairs, even to the "double-decker diner," as the Boarder had called the table arrangement.

"And what has he done for you, Amarilly, that you are so anxious he should have a rug?"

"He's larnin' me readin', writin', spellin', and figgers."

"Don't you go to school?"

"No; I hev to bring in wages and help ma with the washin's."

"I'll teach you, Amarilly," she said impulsively. "I'm sure I'm more

The Woman Came Last

To Van Camp's—a Queer Fact

This is for housewives to ponder.

Years ago there appeared a new dish of Baked Beans called Van Camp's. The beans were mealy, mellow, whole. A wondrous sauce was baked into them. The dish had new tang and zest.

The dish was chef-baked, in far-away kitchens; yet it brought to the table a fresh oven aroma.

It meant less cooking, smaller meat bills. It meant delightful, hearty meals ready for instant serving.

Does it not seem that women—by the masses—would be first to welcome such a dish?

But it wasn't so. The men came first. They urged Van Camp's. And even today this is known as the man's dish—as the "Club Style" Pork and Beans. It is served to men in thousands of noon-day lunch rooms.

Yet it now has won millions of women.

VAN CAMP'S
PORK & BEANS BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE

Also Baked Without the Sauce

10, 15 and 20 Cents Per Can

Do you realize how much this National Dish owes to our kitchens and our chefs?

This zestful sauce is a Van Camp creation.

Baking the sauce with the beans, so the tang goes through, was a Van Camp invention.

The Van Camp ovens brought about right baking. In these ovens the beans are baked for hours without crisping or bursting. In old-time ways beans were not even half baked. They always resisted digestion.

In these days we pick out our beans by analysis, to get beans that all bake alike.

Baked Beans become a delicacy—a frequent, favorite dish—when a home adopts Van Camp's.

You owe yourself a knowledge of Van Camp's.

Buy a can of Van Camp's Beans to try. If you do not find them the best you ever ate, your grocer will refund your money.

"Conscious Evolution"

By Donald Richardson

THE simple fact that the human body is built up of billions of cells, all resulting from the evolution of one original cell, is in itself interesting, but little more to the average person. The further declaration that health, life and pleasures of the body depend upon the condition of each individual cell compels notice.

When, however, along comes an individual who combines intimate scientific knowledge of the human cell with the discovery of the means to insure its health and develop unusual energy and potency—who by reason of study, experience and a certain genius, shows us how without inconvenience, apparatus, drugs, study or loss of time, we can put unusual health and uncommon life into every one of our vast multitude of cells, thus giving the human body and mind the maximum of health, pleasure and power, and do this in a very perfectly natural, easy and practical way,—then we are all attention.

A Great Secret of Life

This is the marvelous secret uncovered in a wonderful little book by Swoboda, a great pioneer in the realm of physiological science. Some day the complete history of "Conscious Evolution" and its discoverer will be recorded, with all its immense significance and far-reaching ramifications. This brief article can only sketch the rough outlines.

The story of Alois P. Swoboda is one of the romances of human history. As the discoverer of the origin and nature of the laws governing "conscious energy" and of a scientific system for applying those laws in a manner that has operated successfully in over two hundred thousand cases, Swoboda occupies a peculiar niche in earth's hall of fame. He did not merely write a great book, paint a great picture, invent some useful device, or win some particular battle. His fame is built on a far more substantial foundation. He is the wizard of the human body. He is the apostle of the greater, the successful life. Swoboda not only re-creates men and women; he makes them more powerful, capable, and happy than they were before. He advances them a tremendous way along the line of human development. The man himself—as well as his hosts of enthusiastic clients—is a most convincing example of the effectiveness of his methods. He has revolutionized the methods of energizing the body and mind.

The Swoboda System of Conscious Evolution Based on a Knowledge of all Sciences

Swoboda fairly radiates vitality, his whole being pulsating with unusual life and energy. And his mind is even more alert and active than his body; he is tireless. He discourses with learned fluency on the science of "Conscious Evolution," which embraces all other sciences, entering with equal ease and facility on any phase of this all-important subject. Start him on his particular specialty—the development of human powers—and he pours out a veritable flood of illuminating exposition. Earnest and vehement, he rises to eloquence as he unfolds in his masterful manner the magnificent possibilities of man under the guidance of "conscious energy." You are impressed with the fact that you are in the presence of a remarkable personality, a superior product of the Swoboda system of body and personality building. Swoboda embodies in his own super-developed person the best proof of the correctness of his theories and of the success of his "Conscious Evolution."

The Aim of Conscious Evolution is Better Minds, Better Bodies, Better Health and More Intense Pleasures

Mr. Swoboda must not be classed with ordinary physiologists, physicians, faddists or with those whose aim is merely the development of muscle. Neither his philosophy nor his science is confined to such narrow limits. Swoboda's plan comprehends the complete development of the human being—increased internal force, more body power, more brain power, mind power and, in fact, greater capacity to live and enjoy in every way. He is primarily interested in those influences which make for a fuller and more potent life.

One cannot remain long in the presence of Swoboda without realizing that he is mentally and physically a superman. He makes you feel that you are only partially well, and vigorous and ambitious, only partially developed, that, in short, you are only half as alive as you must be if you wish to enjoy to the full the benefits of living,—that you are leading an inferior life. No one can read his book without becoming conscious of his wonderful power and personality.

Swoboda is a Man Who is Centuries in Advance of His Time

His discovery of conscious evolution is itself of epochal importance. But its scientific and successful application is more wonderful still.

The feat of Franklin in drawing the electric spark from the clouds was a wonder of the time. Yet it took a hundred years to master the secret of that electric spark and harness the giant force of electricity to the uses of mankind. Swoboda not only discovered the marvelous secret and principle of Conscious Evolution, but applies it to individuals with results that are incalculable. Swoboda might, indeed, be called a specialist for the human race.

A single electric spark is of little importance. But intensify that spark and multiply it a billion-fold, and you have the power, the heat and the dazzling lights of a great city. So with our cells, says Swoboda. Quickened one, and it makes little difference. But energize and intensify them all, and you have a "live-wire" human being, with mental and physical potency plus!—the Swoboda kind of body and mind.

Ponce de Leon's fountain of youth died with him. Your fountain of youth will die with you. Each man's fountain of youth is within himself. Through Conscious Evolution only can you drink to the full of the fountain of youth.

Swoboda demonstrates that no matter how old we may be we can through the conscious use of the principles of Evolution make ourselves full-powered dynamos, with every part and wheel and power-belt thoroughly in trim, working smoothly and at maximum capacity—100 per cent. efficient.

If you believe you have developed to the highest degree your vitality, energy and powers of living and enjoying, you are, according to the Swoboda Standard, indeed mistaken. Conscious Evolution can lead you to a new and even greater realization of health, energy and pleasure.

More power, energy and life are the needs and will be the salvation of the present generation. The problem has always been how to get them. Eagerly we try each solution offered, swarming like the Athenians after every new thing. And yet the means lie right within us, as Swoboda clearly demonstrates.

Conscious Evolution is an antidote to old age in its every form and variety of conditions. It scientifically reduces excessive blood pressure, restores elasticity to arteries and turns the dial of physiological time in the direction of youth, efficiency, vitality and greater pleasure.

No one who is energized through Conscious Evolution will be subject to indigestion, bowel sluggishness, nervous exhaustion, brain fog, sleeplessness, nervousness, or any functional difficulty of any character.

Swoboda Has Written a Wonderful Little Book

This book explains the Swoboda System of Conscious Evolution and the human body as it has never been explained before. It makes clear Swoboda's new theory of the mind and body. It startles, educates and enlightens. It tells how the cells build the body and how to organize them beyond the point where nature left off, for each one of us. It will give you a better understanding of yourself than you could obtain from a college course; the information which it imparts cannot be duplicated elsewhere at any price. It shows the unlimited possibilities through conscious evolution of the cells; it explains Swoboda's discoveries and what they are doing for thousands of men and women of every age and condition. It tells of the Dangers and after-effects of Exercise, and Conscious Deep Breathing. Swoboda's book shows how any one may possess unusual health and vitality.

You will cherish this book for having given you the first real understanding of your body and mind and for showing you how you may be able to attain greater pleasure and in every way a superior life.

Thousands have advanced themselves in every way through a better realization and conscious use of the principles of evolution, which Swoboda discovered. It will open new avenues through which you may become successful, in satisfying your most intense desires. It is not a dry treatise on physiology; on the contrary, it tells in a highly interesting and simple manner just what you need to know, about the body and mind and the laws of their evolution.

proficient in those branches than the Boarder."

"He sez," admitted Amarilly, "that it won't take him long to learn me all he knows; but you see— She spoke with delicate hesitancy and evident embarrassment. "It's orful good in you to want to learn me—but he might feel hurt like if I was to quit him."

"You are right, Amarilly. You are a loyal little girl. But I tell you what we will do about it. When you have learned all that the Boarder feels he can teach you, you shall go to night-school. There is one in connection with St. Mark's. I will see that you enter there."

"I didn't know thar was one fer girls," said Amarilly. "I'm glad thar's a way fer me to git eddicated, fer I must hev larnin' afore I kin go on the stage. Mr. Vedder, the ticket-seller to Barlow's, told me so."

"Amarilly"—and an earnest note crept into the gay young voice—"you may find things that you will like to do more than to go on the stage."

"No!" asserted the youthful aspirant, "thar ain't nuthin' else I'd like so well."

"Amarilly, I am going to tell you something. Once, not long ago, I had the stage fever, but I think I know now there is something—something I should like better."

"What?" queried Amarilly skeptically.

"I can't tell you now, but you have a long time yet in which to decide your future. Tell me what I can do to help your mother."

"If you could git us more washin's," exclaimed Amarilly eagerly, "it would help heaps. We could take in lots more than we do now."

"Let me think. You see, we keep a laundress; but—does your mother do up very fine things—like laces—carefully?"

"She does," replied Amarilly glibly. "She kin do 'em orful keeful, and we dry the colored stuffs in the shade. And our clo'es come out snow-white allers, and we never tears laces nor gits in too much bluin' or starch the way some folks does."

"Then I'll give you my address and you can come for my fine waists; and let me see, I am sure I can get St. Mark's laundry work for you, too."

"You're orful good, Miss King. This is where we hev to turn down this 'ere court."

The "court" appeared to Miss King more like an alley. The advent of the brougham in the little narrow right-of-way filled every window with hawk-eyed observers. About the Jenkin's doorstep was grouped the entire household from the Boarder to the baby, and the light, musical voices of children floating through the soft spring air fell pleasantly upon the ears of the young settlement worker.

"So this is where you live, Amarilly?" she asked, her eyes sparkling as she focused them on the family. "You needn't come for the washing the first time. I will bring it myself, so I can see all your little brothers. Be sure to come to the Guild next Saturday, and then I'll have the rug for you to take home. Good-by, dear."

Knowing that she was observed by myriad eyes, Amarilly stepped loftily from the brougham and made a sweeping stage courtesy to her departing benefactress.

"Are you on the stage now, Amarilly?" asked Coe eagerly as she came to meet her sister.

"No; but she," with a wave of her hand toward the swiftly gliding electric, "is a-goin' to help me git eddicated, and she has give me a beautiful rug fer the Boarder, and we're a-goin' to hev her waists to wash, and Mr. St. Mark's clo'es, and she told all the scholars to sew like me 'cause I sewed the best, and I've larned how to set our table. We mustn't stack up the knife and fork and spoon on ends any more. The knife goes to the right, the fork to the left of the plate, and the spoon goes back of it and the tumbler and the napkin, when you has 'em, to the right."

"I do declare, Amarilly, if it ain't jest like a fairy story!" cried Mrs. Jenkins enthusiastically. "You allers did strike luck."

"You bet!" cried Bobby admiringly.

"Things go some where Amarilly was happier even than she had been on the night of the centennial day. The electric boarder had seemed a veritable fairy godmother to her. But it was not that that stood uppermost in her mind as she lay awake far into the night; it was the little word of endearment uttered in caressing cadence.

"No one ain't ever called me that afore," she murmured wistfully, "s'pose ma ain't hed time, and thar wa no one else to keer."

Impulsively and tenderly he took the little arm encircled the baby's arm beside her.

"Dear!" she whispered in a sweet tone. "Dear!"

CHAPTER III

Many washerwomen had applied for the task of laundering the ecclesiastical linen; many had been tried and found wanting. So after her interview with Amarilly, Colette asked the rector of St. Mark's to call at her house on an important business."

From the time he was ten years old until he became rector of St. Mark's, John Meredith had been a member of the household of his guardian, Henry King, and had ever cheerfully and loyally borne with the caprices of the little Colette.

He answered the present summons promptly and palpitantly. It had been two weeks since he had communicated with Colette for the surprisingly sudden announcement, made in a minute seriousness, that she was going to study opera with a view to going on the stage. The fact that she had a light sweet soprano adapted only to the recitation of drawing-room ballads did no lessen in his eyes the probability of her carrying out this resolve.

She had met his reproving exaltations in a spirit of banteringillery, and replied with a defiance of his opinion that had pierced his heart with arrow-like swiftness. Since then she had studiously avoided meeting him, and he was not sure whether he now recalled to listen to a reiteration of her intentions or to receive an anode for the bitterness of her remarks at their last interview.

"I sent for you, John," she said demurely and without preamble, "to see if you have found a satisfactory laundress yet for the surplices."

"Colette!" he exclaimed in raking tone, his face reddening at her question which he supposed to be made in mere mockery.

"I am not speaking to you as Colette King," she replied with a loud half-cajoling, half-flippant, "but as a teacher in the Young Woman's Auxiliary Guild to the rector of St. Mark's. You see I no longer lead a foolish, futile life here is the evidence in the case," holding up a slender pink forefinger. "See how it is pricked! For three Saturday afternoons I have shown little girls that smelled of fried potatoes how to wash, shall really learn something myself about the feminine art of needlework if I continue in my present straight domestic path."

"Colette, you cannot know he expects me to hear this. Why did you try to make me think the laundry work was —"

"But the laundry work is the main issue. Yesterday I had quite decided to give up this uninteresting work."

Watching him warily, she saw the shadow in his eyes linger a moment before she continued:

"And then there came into my class a new pupil, poorly clad and ignorant but so redolent of soapsuds as with such a freshly laundered look that renewed my inclinations to change. I took her home in my electric, and she lived at a distance that gave me ample time to listen to the complete chronicle of her young life. Her father, I learned, Her mother was left with eight children whom she supports by taking in washing. They have a boarder and pay for around the dining-room table. My new pupil's name is Amarilly Jenkins, and she has educational longings which cannot be satisfied because she has to work, so I am going to enter her in St. Mark's night-school when she has finished a special course with the private tutor she now has."

Colette," said the young minister earnestly. "Why do you continually try to throw yourself to me in a false light? It is sweet in you to take this little girl home in your brougham and to feel an interest in her improvement." "Not at all!" protested Colette. "My fate at present may appear to be charitable, but Amarilly and I have a common interest—a fellow feeling—that makes me wondrous kind. We both have longings to appear in public on the stage." This sudden challenge, this second blowing of the red flag, John's face grew stern.

"Amarilly," continued the liquid voice, "has had more experience in stage life than I have had. She has commenced at the lowest round of the dramatic ladder of fame. She scrubs at the farlow Theater, and she is quite familiar with stage lore. Her hero is the man who plays the rôle of Lord Almon in A Terrible Trial."

John made no reply, and Colette presently broke the silence.

"Seriously, John," she said practically and in a tone far different from her former one, "the Jenkins family are poor and most deserving. I am going to give them some work, and if you would give them a trial on the church linen, it would help them so much. There was a regular army of little children on the doorstep, and it must be a struggle to feed them all. I should like to help them—to give them something—but they seem to be the kind of people that you can help only by giving them work to perform. I have learned that true independence is only among the poor."

John took a little notebook from his pocket.

"What is their address, Colette?" "He took the book from him and wrote down the street and number."

"Colette, you endeavor to conceal a secret heart?"

"And will you give them—Mrs. Jenkins—a trial?"

"Yes; this week."

"That will make Amarilly so happy," she said brightly. "I am going the tomorrow to take them some work, and I will tell Mrs. Jenkins to see Flamingus; his is the only name of the brood that my memory retains—of the church laundry."

"He may call at the rectory," replied John, "and get the house laundry as well."

"That will be good news for them. I all enjoy watching Amarilly's face when she hears it."

"And now, Colette, will you do something for me?"

"Maybe. What is it?" she asked goodly.

"Will you abandon the idea of going off the stage, or studying for that purpose?"

"Perforce. Father won't consent."

"A look of relief drove the trouble from the dark eyes fixed on her."

"I'll be twenty-one in a year, however," she added carelessly.

John was wise enough to perceive the wisdom that prompted this reply, and he deftly changed the subject of conversation.

"About this little girl, Amarilly. We must find her something in the way of employment. The atmosphere of a tutor isn't the proper one for a child of that age. Do you think so?"

Theoretically, no; but Amarilly is not impressionable to atmosphere altogether. She seems a hard-working, staunch little soul, and all that relieves the sordidness of her life and lightens the dreariness of her work is the 'theater,' as she calls it. So don't destroy her illusions, John. You'll do her more harm than good."

"Not if I give her something real in the place of what you rightly term her illusions."

"You can't. Sunday school would not satisfy a broad-minded little proletarian like Amarilly, so don't preach to her."

He winced perceptibly. "Do I preach to you, Colette? Is that how you regard me—as a prosy preacher who—"

"No, John. Just a disturber of dreams—that is all."

"A disturber of dreams?" he repeated wistfully. "It is you, Colette, who are a disturber of dreams. If you would only let my dreams become realities!"

"Then, to be paradoxical, your realities might change back to dreams, or even nightmares. Returning to soap-suds and Amarilly Jenkins, will you go there with me tomorrow and make arrangements with Mrs. Jenkins for the laundry work?"

"Indeed I will, Colette, and—"

"Don't look so serious, John. Until that dreadful evening, the last time you called, you always left your pulpit punctilio behind you when you came here."

"Colette!" he began in protest.

But she perversely refused to fall in with his serious vein. Chattering gayly, yet half defiantly, on her face the while a baffling smile, partly tender, partly amused, and wholly coquettish—the smile that maddened and yet entranced him—she brought the mask of reserve to his face and manner. At such times he never succeeded in remembering that she was but little more than a child, heart-free, capricious, and wilful. Despairing of changing her mood to the serious one that he loved yet so seldom evoked, he arose and bade her good-night.

When he was in the hall she softly called him back, meeting him with a half-penitent look in her eyes, which had suddenly become gazelle-like.

"You may preach to me again sometime, John. There are moments when I believe I like it, because no other man dares to do it."

"Dares?" he queried with a smile.

"Yes; dares. They all fear to offend. And you, John, you fear nothing!"

"Yes, I do," he answered gravely, as he looked down upon her. "There is one thing I fear that makes me tremble, Colette."

But her mood had again changed, and with a mischievous, elusive smile she bade him go. Inert and musing, he wandered at random through the lights and shadows of the city streets, with a wistful look in his eyes and just the shadow of a pang in his heart.

"She is very young," he said condoningly, answering an accusing thought. "She has been a little spoiled, naturally. She has seen life only from the side that amuses and entertains. Some day, when she realizes, as it comes to us all to do, that care and sorrow bring their own sustaining power, she will not dally among the petty things of life; the wilful waywardness will turn to winning womanliness."

EXARCH OF BULGARIAN CHURCH

An imposing funeral procession took place July 8 in Sofia, Bulgaria, for the Exarch Joseph I., the head of the Bulgarian National Church.

His secular name was Lazar Yovtcheff. He began his public activity as a candidate for judge of civil court in Constantinople, where lawsuits of Bulgarians were tried. In 1872 he was appointed chief secretary to the Exarch, and was made a monk by the Exarch under the name Joseph. In a short time he was promoted from Exarch to another until in 1874 he became a bishop. When in 1877 the Turkish Government expelled the Exarch to resign, Joseph was appointed in his place. When told that he could get concessions from the Turkish Government for Bulgarians, he replied that he would insist that he succeeded and he did. He gained the right to build schools in which Bulgarians could be taught in their own tongue, which have given Macedonia an intelligent community. The school and the church were the two main factors stirring the Bulgarian national spirit.

After the recent Balkan wars he removed to Sofia, and it was hoped that he would now devote himself to purely spiritual activity. But nothing of the kind was done and the Bulgarian National Church must still hope for a reformer who will instill into it a new life of spirituality. M. N. P.

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D.

"I am the Lord that healeth thee."—Ex. 15:26.

The wonderful fact about our Lord's miracles is that he never hesitated to put forth his healing power. When we visit the sick and kneel beside them to pray for their recovery, our first enquiry is whether it is God's will or not that they should be set free from their sickness. But our Lord apparently was never withheld by such an enquiry. However many sick cases were brought before him—as, for instance, when the whole city seemed gathered to the street where Peter lived, and the passage to his door was littered with people in every form and stage of disease—the Saviour poured forth the energy or virtue that were ever at his bidding and healed them all. From this, the thought arises whether sickness and disease need be the necessary accompaniments of human life, and whether there are not divine resources available, our faith, of which we know but little, the same time the Lord used means, as clay for the blind eyes, and the pool of Siloam and the anointing oil. But this, at least, is certain: that we may take from Christ only "the healing of the body," but "healing of the mind." If you are afflicted by evil desires and unholy images, turn, Christ, saying with the poetess:

"Just as I am—poor, wretched, blind,
Sight, riches, healing of the mind,
Yea, all I need in thee to find,
O Lamb of God, I come."

"Whom Are You Doubting?"

By Amos R. Wells

IT is a very striking instance of the breadth of Bible views that we are told that Naaman, though a Syrian general and often fighting Israel, had been made victorious by Jehovah. This is true, however, in all nations and at all times. "If the hand of the Lord is withheld," wrote Dr. Cuyler, "the hand of the strongest man is paralyzed."

But this does not mean that Naaman did not work for his victories. Palissy the potter was so eager in his work that he would forget to eat and drink and sleep. After spending all his money on his experiments in enamels, he kept up his furnace fires by burning his garden fence, then his tables and other furniture. Says Dr. Pierson, "He was so absorbed in his work that, like Poussa, the Chinese potter, he would have thrown himself into the furnace rather than fail in his life work." It is to such men that God can give success, as he gave it to Naaman.

"But he was a leper." That is one of the saddest lines in the Bible. Ah, these "buts!" How they take the sparkle out of life! How they underlie our joys as the mud underlies the shining surface of the lake! And yet, as A. J. Gordon once said, "Sorrow is only one of the lower notes in the oratorio of our blessedness." If the mud is there, so also is the lake, and far deeper than the mud. Naaman's leprosy helped, doubtless, to develop his heroism. "No man is truly a man until he is sick," wrote the German poet Heine; and Heine knew, for a great part of his life was spent on a bed of torture.

Many a great fortune, like Naaman's, has hung on the character and conduct of little folks, like the Hebrew girl, the captive. No one is too humble to count greatly in this world. Once a wise diplomatist drew from a letter of state, apparently very firm, the conclusion that the writer was irresolute. "Where in that letter," his king asked, "do you discover irresolution?" "In its n's and g's," was the answer. You may be only an n or a g in the world's great history, but you count for its decision or indecision.

How beautiful was the sympathy of the Hebrew girl for the general, though he had taken her away from her home and dear ones! Talmage once advised his hearers to measure themselves and see how many inches they were around—50, 60, or what not. "Is that," he then asked, "the circle of your sympathies, just the size of yourself? Or, to measure around your heart would it take a girdle large enough to encircle the land and the whole world?" That last was the measure of that little girl's heart.

Naaman took with him much silver and gold and rich raiment, but found it was all useless. How much there is that gold cannot buy! Lower New York is the richest district in the world. The fifteen thousand owners of its two square miles have a total annual income of one billion dollars, or $66,666 each.

Just north and east of this district is another, a mile square, the most populous district in the world; but its 60,000 people pay no income tax whatever. Yet the largest depositor in the bank of heaven may come as well from the second district as from the first.

When Naaman got within sight of healing he almost lost the great blessing through pride. He needed the spirit of another and far greater general, "Chinese" Gordon. One day Gordon, when in Palestine, received a telegram from England appointing him to a very important position which he had long desired. That evening a friend found him outside the city wall, and reproached with him because of the danger from Arabs. He replied, "The telegram from England filled me with exultation I felt I might get into trouble by being proud, so I have come here by myself to humble myself before Christ." Naaman needed to learn that, in the words of Dr. A. C. Dixon, "The wars of God's blessings flow downward, and he who would drink them must stoop."

Naaman's bath in the Jordan is one of the best illustrations of the salvation offered by Christ. It is so easy so plain, so efficacious. It does not need strength of body or brilliancy of intellect; all it needs is faith.

Long ago Dr. Chapman told I. L. Moody that somehow he could not get the assurance he wanted as to his salvation. "Whom are you doubting?" Moody asked bluntly, and the question brought Dr. Chapman face to face with his lack of faith. Are you a Christian? Have you accepted salvation? If not, Whom are you doubting?

Healing the World's Plague

By Arthur H. Howland

NOT long ago I had the rare privilege of being one of a small group of Christian workers who heard Dr. Victor George Heiser speak intimately and freely of his unique work among lepers of the Philippines. He told of the first difficulties in persuading patients to go to the leper colony, and of the willingness of others to go even the camp had been established; till now practically every leper of the archipelago is at the colony. He told of their social life, their work and recreation, their marriages and homes, their treatment, and occasionally, their cure. It is the old chaulmoogra oil that does it, used now with a combination of ether, which prevents the horrible nausea which formerly made the remedy such a horror that patients, though they could observe its healing powers, would sometimes refuse to take it.

Expert opinions differ widely on the matter of the contagion of leprosy. Some are almost inclined to think it is not contagious at all, and no one as yet learned how the disease is communicated. Fortunately the scourge is practically unknown in the western world and has been almost entirely eliminated from many countries of the eastern hemisphere. But in Asia there are still many thousands afflicted with it.

A leper is thought of as the most unfortunate object on earth. You sinners in worse plight and the land has not yet been found where sin is unknown.

A positive remedy has been found for sin, yet it is hard to persuade people to take the remedy. We expect the drunkard and the thief to take it, and rejoice at the reports from missions and rescue homes that tell of the triumphs of salvation. When an evangelistic campaign is on in our community, we are glad to see many accept God's immense gift of salvation. But aside from rescue mission work and evangelistic campaigns, the crusade of soul healing should be going on jubilantly, enthusiastically, everywhere. Here we have the one great specific for the one dread disease of the race. What are we doing about it? What souls are we trying to lead to health? What efforts are we making to free society, as well as individuals, from the curse of sin?

Some forms of sin have seemed so respectable, have so received the sanction of society and even often of the church, that the public conscience is slow to recognize them as truly sinful. Yet these respectable sins are just as loathsome as the others. It needs more courage to deal with them. Winston Churchill in "The Inside of the Cup" tells how a brave minister attacked the sins of the rich men of his congregation, sins of oppression and injustice.

It is worthy of special note that it was precisely this kind of wrong that Isaiah was thinking of when describing the loathsome condition of his sinful nation. "From the sole of the foot even unto the head there is no soundness in it; but wounds and bruises, and putrefying sores. They have not been closed; neither bound up, neither mollified with ointment." Then he cried: "Wash you, make you clean; put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes; cease to do evil; learn to do well. Seek justice, relieve the oppressed, judge the fatherless, plead for the widows. Come now and let us reason together, saith the Lord. Though your sins be scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool."

Echoes from the Holy Land

NAAMAN was a leper. Leprosy was a type of sin because confirmed leprosy was and is an incurable disease. Some skin diseases which resemble real leprosy or incipient leprosy can be cured and even cured or disappear. I know of more than one man and woman among our acquaintances that have such spots. It is not a violently contagious disease, such as cholera, smallpox or bubonic plague, but can be compared rather to tuberculosis in its communicability. There is an asylum for confirmed and hopeless lepers in Jerusalem, called the Jesurite and maintained by the Moravian Brothers where the doctor and the attendants live in the same building and which he visit frequently to observe the work. The confirmed cases are not isolated or confined to the building but go and come freely. They show all the horrible results in loss of eyes, fingers, hands, feet and features, which make the disease an awful type of sin.

The captive maid. In all ages this form of human plunder was one of the dreadful accompaniments of war. The internment of non-combatants in this latest and worst of wars might almost develop into a form of slavery unless carefully controlled or wholly eradicated.

I will send a letter. The idea of an intercessor is deeply ingrained in the nature and customs of the Orient. An inferior will never approach a superior without an intercessor if he can possibly obtain one, the unwritten philosophy of the custom being that what might be refused the suppliant cannot possibly be denied the intercessor. During these times of great distress we receive many letters from friends or acquaintances in behalf of people we have never seen. Instead of rendering our clothes, like the king of Israel, we are compelled to render our purses for the sake of the intercessor.

Wash in Jordan. He had come a journey of over 100 miles to the prophet and was now told to make another journey of 30 miles down into the furnace heat of the Jordan valley to a tortuous muddy stream. It was a great test of his soldier obedience to a command, from a strange looking man, but it was carried out, after an Oriental explosion of temper, involving a comparison of the muddy Jordan with the clear cold Abana and Parphar at Damascus.

Seven times. One of the sacred numbers, which are usually reckoned as 3, 4, 7, 10, 12, 10, 70. It is said to be produced by adding the two sacred numbers 3 and 4, or by taking one-fourth of the lunar month—that is, the seven-day sections, or from the seven planets known to the very earliest astronomy. The discussion and use of numbers in Oriental literature forms a branch of supposed learning that fills volumes and is of entrancing charm to some minds.

A Druggist of the Old School

JOHN CALHOUN DELANY was a druggist of the old school. His store might have been a chemist's shop of the eighteenth century. In his windows four glass bottles full of colored liquids, red, green, orange and blue, magnified the flames of often smoky kerosene lamps. Between the red and green globes on the terraced shelves of the shallow window various nostrums suitable to the season challenged the passer-by to come in and declare his symptoms. In the other window a varied assortment of cheap toys was almost hidden by rows of the latest illustrated papers hung by clips from wires across the window. The air of the store was redolent of balsams and rare herbs, and the proprietor, small, wiry, quick of movement, with a gray-tinged but rather sparse chin whisker and mustache, looked as if he might have been preserved in some of his own balsams. It was in the early eighties that I first made the acquaintance of Druggist Delany and his store. I had been sent with a prescription, and I looked at the pictures in the illustrated papers while strange sounds of pestle and spatula and of pouring and dropping liquids came from behind the prescription case. At last I received a box of powders and a bottle of very black liquid. Having done this errand well I became a fairly regular visitor in Delany's shop—if for nothing else than to hear stories of the war and to read the latest illustrated paper without buying it.

Delany had learned the art of compounding drugs in the office of a physician, but was just a peg short of the full course in medicine when the war broke out. After four years of army service he felt that he could ill afford to study longer, so he abandoned his first desire and became a reader instead of a writer of prescriptions. His store was no doubt up to date when it was opened; it was not materially different from the other drug stores in town when I first knew it. One side of the room was lined with shelves full of bottles with Latin labels in gilt on a white ground. The shelves on the other side were crowded with patent and proprietary medicines of all kinds and for many uses. Each package had upon it a list of the things the contents were meant to cure or to relieve; and what was more important then, the retail selling price. Delany always charged the full price. In the center of the store glass cases held toilet accessories, rubber goods, small packages of ointments and a select assortment of candy, which stayed in stock until it was sold, and which often failed to stimulate a second purchase. The prescription case blocked the single aisle and hid its mysteries from all but the initiate. I felt that I had reached one summit of my ambition when I was permitted to enter the sacred area behind the case.

THIS was the store, and thus it has remained until this very day, while progress has surged around it and its trade has dwindled. In the days of my youth, before homeopathy had shown the futility of overdosing and Mother Eddy had proclaimed the folly of any sort of dosing, the drug store filled a very important place in the economy of things, purely as a drug store. In the winter our quarter's drug bill was often larger than our monthly grocery bill, and we were rather moderate in our use of drugs; at least my mother thought we were. Between syrup of rhubarb every time I sneezed and castor oil and Jamaica ginger and iron tonic and spring medicine and quinine and one or two other standbys, I felt that even "moderation" could be carried to extremes. Physicians' charges were not excessive then yet Delany was called upon to prescribe for every kind and intensity of human ill. He would listen to all the symptoms, look as wise and sympathetic as he could with all his experience, shake his head slowly a few times and disappear behind that prescription case. Sometimes he would stop there and the patient would almost faint under the burden of his symptoms, become even more poignant in narration. More often he would reappear before the shelves of prepared remedies, touch one, shake his head, touch another and take it down only to put it back, and finally reach away up or back behind something, bring out a box which seemed to be just right, and walk briskly back to the waiting sufferer. His choice of remedies seldom proved wrong, due perhaps to the fact that seventy-five per cent. of all our human ills will heal themselves under proper care and a favorable mental attitude. The day of drug-store prescribing has now almost gone by, and the day of overdosing has gone with it. The prescription trade of today would not pay a druggist's rent, and the retailing of cure-alls has suffered a severe setback. All these things Delany appears not to know. His old trade stays by him, and he gains as much pleasure out of reminiscing with the other pioneers as he once gained profit from their trade.

When the soda-fountain made its appearance, Delany scoffed at it. He has not yet installed one, and probably he has the only drug store in forty counties without one. This peculiarity does not, however, draw him any custom. Younger men scenting the sales-pulling power of an efficient refreshment stand have made the most of this modern adjunct to the chemist's trade; in fact, one of the finest fountains in town is in the drug store of a man who learned to roll pills at Delany's prescription case. Delany is glad to see the younger man succeed, but declares that his place looks and smells like a restaurant.

WHEN it was first discovered that a business could live on less than the retail price printed on the boxes of prepared medicines, Delany felt that the suggestion was utter heresy. If sarsaparilla was a dollar a bottle it remained a dollar a bottle at Delany's. If you suggested that it was only 79 cents at Robinson's, across the street, your word was not questioned, neither was the price cut. As a result, most of those who feel that they just must have sarsaparilla buy it at Robinson's, and Delany can't understand yet how Robinson makes any money; yet Robinson rides in an eight-cylinder car and Delany walks—briskly, but not as briskly as in the eighties—and wonders when all this extravagance will be the end of Robinson.

Amateur photography never made an impression on Delany's stock; he could not harmonize cameras and films and plates and papers with the merchandising of health in powder, pill and bottle. The fact that every step in the process was one of applied chemistry did not move him from his prejudice against any line that offered no more than twenty per cent. profit. He could not see the long series of easily made sales to an enthusiastic amateur which inevitably follows the sale of a camera, nor the value of the line as a magnet to draw trade within the creaking doors of his store.

He has never put in a modern candy case. The candy he has doesn't sell; why should he invest a lot of money in more candy? Similarly he has consistently refused to employ a boy to run his errands and deliver his packages. People have always come to his store and carried their purchases away with them. A delivery and errand boy would be a superfluity and a nuisance. The other stores keep busy a boy or two apiece. You can telephone for a box of headache powders, or a brick of ice-cream, or a pound of chocolates, or a bottle of your favorite remedy, and any of the other stores will have it in your hands as quickly as a boy and a bicycle can reach you. Not so with Delany's. He has never realized the business possibilities of the telephone; in fact, he refused to put one in for many years. As for those side lines not strictly comprehended within the purview of the "materia medica," but which by national advertising have become both standard and quick-selling sources of profit in the drug stores of the country, Delany will tell you calmly and smilingly that he is sorry, but he does not keep it.

Delany owns his store building and

There have been several air raids in the past week, notably one on Stuttgart, the capital of Württemberg, by the Allies. The difficulty in these affairs is to obtain any reliable information as to the amount of damage done. As far as can be judged from the results achieved by the air raids since the beginning of the war, non-combatants are the victims in practically all cases, and it may be doubted whether or not the military results achieved are in proportion to the effort.

The campaign in the West has suddenly taken on new life through the beginning of the long heralded allied offensive. On the extreme west of the line, between Ypres and the sea, the Belgians, who have not been heard from for many months, started an artillery attack on the German positions. Fierce artillery duels took place north of Arras, near Neuville and the Lorette Hills. Roye near the great angle of the line, Soissons and Berry-au-Bac, north of Rheims, were also scenes of severe fighting. In Champagne, early in the week, an infantry advance was made by the French, who succeeded, after artillery preparation, in storming and capturing the crossings of the Aisne and Marne canal, and, advancing beyond, turned the Germans out of trenches which the latter had held for months.

The real offensive followed a 70-hour bombardment of the German positions. On Saturday morning, 25th, the British attacked north of Ypres at Hooge, in the neighborhood of Vermelles, south of La Bassée, and at Loos near Lens and about 12 miles from Lille. The French attacked at Souchez, where fierce fighting resulted in a slight allied advance in May and at Perthes in the Champagne country following up their success earlier in the week. Ground was gained in all of these attacks. The French captured nearly fifteen miles of German first-line trenches, and penetrated in places more than two miles into the German positions. The British captured five miles of trenches near Vermelles and the town of Loos, as well as Hill 70, a mile from Lens, which gives the British artillery command of the railways radiating from this important mining center. North and south of Ypres the British gains were slight and some of the ground gained was lost again under German counter-attacks. The fighting is still going on, the Allies endeavoring to press their advantage and the Germans making every possible use of their skilfully constructed defensive positions and of their reserves.

Mr. Asquith announced in the Commons during the week that the British forces under arms, including the Indian troops, and the Colonials, now amounted

The Cock-Pit of Europe

The heavy line running from Budapest to Constantinople marks the all important railway route so essential to the Austro-German plans to three million. Of course not all of these are in foreign service.

The campaign in the Dardanelles has been very quiet, but this must not be taken to mean that there has been no fighting. There has been plenty of that and plenty of resultant casualties, but the fighting now is almost all of the trench order, and mines, hand grenades, etc., are now as much used in this sphere of activities as on the western line itself, and the positions change only with great slowness.

The Austro-Italian campaign can be summed up in one word: stagnation. The Austrians are not in sufficient force to attempt any offensive themselves, and the last week the fighting has degenerated into a succession of unconnected and meaningless infantry or artillery skirmishes which, while costing lives, have no military value.

In the German campaign against Russia, the most spectacular event of the week was the capture of Vilna. Von Hindenburg late last week drove his right wing through the Russian forces defending Lida on the railroad between Vilna and Rovno, and advanced rapidly to the eastward, taking in succession the towns of Novo-Grunok, Rakitsky and Dolina, while his cavalry, advancing in front of the main army, seized the line of railroad between Vilna and Minsk at Molodischino, which is also the terminus of the military railroad northward to Polotsk. The effect of this was to shut off Vilna from all rail communication except to the northward to Dunaburg. This, however, was soon cut by the left center of Von Hindenburg, near Dawgelschki, and was followed by the capture of Widsy and Vilna.

North of Dunaburg, in Courland, the German forces moving from the city through Jacobstadt and Friedrichstadt to Riga, the line being already in their possession. Finally, the Germans crossed the river Duna west of Friedrichstadt at Lenn and captured that town, thus cutting off from Riga.

While these things were going on in the north, the armies of Prince Leopold of Bavaria and of General Von Eriksen, operating south of Lida, were moving eastward driving the Russians before them. Leopold first drove his left wing across the Vilna-Rovno road at Moltschad, and then for center and right forward, capturing first Ostrow, then Lipsk, and swinging this wing across the railroad at Medwedischki, from where his whole army began to move eastward toward Minsk. As the news comes that the Russians have begun to evacuate this Still farther south, Von Mackensen continued his eastward advance along the railway running east from Pinsk, captured Pinsk and then Lumin, cutting off Rovno, the Russian army in the south, from all communication with the north; but meeting Russian counter-attacks, Von Mackensen, during the later days of the week, was able to make but little progress.

The Russian offensive against the Austrians and Germans in Galicia and Volhynia has been carried across the rivers parallel to the order and has resulted in the recapture of Lutsk by the Russians and the partial control by them of the fortress marked by Dubno, Rovno and L.

At the opening of Parliament Reginald McKenna, Chancellor of the Exchequer, proposed the budget ever presented to the Commons. The figures were almost staggering and yet they were not questioned, the only questions raised being those connected with how to get the money. The Chancellor stated that the daily rate of expenditure is now more than $20,000,000 and that before the end of the year would probably reach $25,000,000 and that Great Britain would very soon have increased her national debt to more than $41,000,000,000. At the same time Germany was just completing her third great war loan. The total of subscriptions received from the German people was about $3,000,000,000 making a total of $6,250,000,000 which the people of Germany have loaned to the government for the prosecution of the war. Mr. McKenna said that another loan would be necessary in England and Germany announces that a fourth will be necessary by March.

The Modern Alchemy

IN all the darkness of the middle ages there was nothing more full of mystery and magic than was the art of the alchemist. The search for the touchstone, the element that would transmute the baser into the precious metals, inspired both honest work and necromancy; and out of the honest work has come the chemistry of today.

It is not many years since chemistry gained the full confidence of science. The ill-repute of the worker in charms clung to the new science, and the savor of alchemy clung persistently to his honorable successor, chemistry. At first the science of chemistry was concerned almost entirely with medicine and therapeutics. Gradually, from its relation to matters of health and through the persistent research of lovers of pure science, it began to be realized that chemistry entered very largely into nearly every activity of mankind, and the foundations were laid for the chemistry of sanitation, the chemistry of soils, and the chemistry of industry.

Our fathers learned to make steel and to make it very well, but it took the engineering chemist to take all the uncertainty out of the processes and make the result sure in every case. The open-hearth furnace with its frequent chemical tests of the mixture, tests that must give the right result before the charge is drawn and the ingot poured, produces steel that is as near accident-proof as steel can be. The credit belongs to the chemist.

Men have fertilized their fields these many years; but it took soil chemistry to tell them what they were really doing, and to make it possible to tell beforehand what fertilizer was needed and then to check up the result afterward.

INDUSTRY now employs the chemist at every turn, and the National Exposition of Chemical Industries held at the Grand Central Palace in New York the week of September 20 was fairly representative of the wide application of chemistry to the processes of manufacturing. The bulk of the exposition was given over to the manufacturers of machinery used in the chemical industries. The portion of the exhibits that would most interest the average man and the average woman was the division of exhibits of the American dye manufacturers. Ever since the war in Europe separated us from the source of supply which we had come to depend upon, the papers have carried many lugubrious references to the shortage in color materials which was certain to bring us in a short time to a colorless existence. They told us that the chemical skill of the Teutons had been gained by long and patient labor and much experimenting, and that we in America had neither the patience nor the basic talent for research to enable us to meet the German experts or to compete with them. We were told that we were absolutely dependent upon the foreign supply of anilines and aniline derivatives; and that without them we should soon be reduced to a study in black and white. We were told that all the illusive shades and colors that now shimmered in silks or glorified the fabrics on our floors would be unknown when the stock of foreign materials in the country was exhausted. All that we were told.

WHAT proves to be the fact? At the exposition there were several exhibits of American dye manufacturers, exhibiting dyes made from American materials. We may not have the patience to work out the problems at the between the dark and sticky oil and the thousand tints of the dye; but we did have the business acumen to import some of those foreign experts who knew the results of the patent research which had made the industry possible. Around these experts as a nucleus we are now building a dye industry which will supply all our needs and every step of the process will be made in America. At the present time our chemists have not been able to produce all the shades from American coal tar derivatives. The derivative necessary for a good yellow, for instance, have not yet come from an American plant; but one of the exhibits expressed the opinion that within three or four months, before the foreign supply now on hand is exhausted, all the necessary products would be available and the dye industry would be humming smoothly again. It is not now a question of chemical science, as creating the mechanical plants necessary to the commercial application of science. So the war seems to have given us a dye industry.

The Church That Came Back

hear a man preach idealism, even if it isn't practical."

"Idealism! It had been a sermon from the text, 'Thou shalt not steal.'"

ONE day there came a sudden and unlooked-for solution of the problem that continually vexed the soul of St. Croesus' pastor. During a sermon, he heard the clang of firebells. At the close, the entire congregation rushed out en masse. When the pastor reached the street he found it dense with smoke, packed with hurrying crowds and jostling vehicles. A great conflagration had been sweeping through the St. Croesus district for upwards of an hour, now it was clear that the church itself was doomed.

"Jim," my wife cried, "the fire isn't headed for Livingston Street, but we are!"

"I cut a bonny figure at breakfast next morning, togged out in Bob Ainger's extra pantaloons and coat and vest. I put on a borrowed hat and stepped over to Flinn's Garden Theater. Evidently I made a bad impression on the man at the box office.

"Mr. Flinn?" said I.

"That's my name!" he retorted.

"I've dropped in to pay my respects to you," I said. "I'd have come better dressed except for the fire. I'm the minister of the Central Church—burnt out, you know."

A beefy paw gripped mine. "Pleased to meet you! Walk in, your reverence. Sit down and make yourself at home."

"I want to ask if it would interest you to put a price on the Garden Theater—nothing binding—just an off-hand estimate by way of something to figure on. I want this corner for old times' sake, with the notion of building a church here, and I believe there are people ready to back me with the needful."

"All the geniality fled from Flinn's manner. . . . He thrust a thumb into an armhole of his waistcoat and glanced shrewdly at me. 'I ain't stuck on moving,' he said, 'but now look here. If you folks will come across with the right figure, I ain't no mule.'"

"I said . . . 'I think the best way to work up sentiment will be for me to hold a service in the theater Sunday morning. You'd rent it, wouldn't you?'"

"At that his geniality returned, and he laughed. 'Rent it! Not on your life! Take it and welcome!'"

"DO you wonder I could preach? What minister couldn't after wrecking a high and mighty metropolitan church, and going through fire both literally and figuratively and flinging his career to the winds, only to have the whole affair end like this—or rather begin like this?"

"How we sang after the sermon! 'Rock of Ages, Cleft for Me!' It rolled up from the tiers of worshippers before me, and out from the thronged balconies and down from the topmost gallery. It was like a long-drawn sacred cheer a gloria—verse after verse of it.

"For the first time I was capturing poor, frivolous, unchurched Livingston Street. It did itself proud—that street. Except that I knew my own people individually, I doubt if I could have told which were uptown folks and which were representatives of the neighborhood.

"At the end of the last hymn I said: 'I want to request any who would like to speak and any who would like to listen to keep their seats.' At that Deacon Gardner came down the aisle and, pointing to one of the show placards, said: 'Look! When this was a church, that was where the font used to stand. My two dead babies were baptized there.' A woman spoke next: 'I was married in this church. See what it has come to since!' It was Mrs. Gilder. And then Frank Cushing stood in the second row and said, 'Somewhere back of that curtain is the spot where my mother lay in her coffin the day we buried her.' . . .

"Then the subscriptions began. No matter what Flinn asked, the Garden Theater was to come down. . . . We were back home to stay. . . ."

The Wonderful Mission of the Internal Bath

By C. G. PERCIVAL, M. D.

DO you know that over three hundred thousand Americans are at the present time seeking freedom from small, as well as serious ailments, by the practice of Internal Bathing?

Do you know that hosts of enlightened physicians all over the country, as well as osteopaths, physical culturists, etc., etc., are recommending and recognizing this practice as the most likely way now known to secure and preserve perfect health?

There are the best of logical reasons for this practice and these opinions, and these reasons will be very interesting to every one.

In the first place, every physician realizes and agrees that 95 per cent of human illness is caused directly or indirectly by accumulated waste in the colon; this is bound to accumulate, because we of to-day neither eat the kind of food nor take the amount of exercise which Nature demands in order that she may thoroughly eliminate the waste unaided—

That's the reason when you are ill the physician always gives you something to remove this accumulation of waste before commencing to treat your specific trouble.

It's ten to one that no specific trouble would have developed if there were no accumulation of waste in the colon—

And that's the reason that the famous Professor Metchnikoff, one of the world's greatest scientists, has boldly and specifically stated that if our colons were taken away in infancy, the length of our lives would be increased to probably 150 years. You see, this waste is extremely poisonous, and as the blood flows through the walls of the colon it absorbs the poisons and carries them through the circulation—that's what causes auto-intoxication, with all its perniciously enervating and weakening results. These pull down our powers of resistance and render us subject to almost any serious complaint which may be prevalent at the time. And the worst feature of it is that there are few of us who know when we are auto-intoxicated.

But you never can be auto-intoxicated if you periodically use the proper kind of an Internal Bath—that is sure.

It is Nature's own relief and corrector—just warm water, which, used in the right way cleanses the colon thoroughly its entire length and makes and keeps it sweet, clean and pure, as Nature demands it shall be for the entire system to work properly.

The following enlightening news article is quoted from the New York Times.

"What may lead to a remarkable advance in the operative treatment of certain forms of tuberculosis is said to have been achieved at Guy's Hospital. Briefly, the operation of the removal of the lower intestine has been applied to cases of tuberculosis, and the results are said to be in every way satisfactory.

"The principle of the treatment is the removal of the cause of the disease. Recent researches of Metchnikoff and others have led doctors to suppose that many conditions of chronic ill-health, such as nervous debility, rheumatism, and other disorders, are due to poisoning set up by unhealthy conditions in the large intestine, and it has even been suggested that the lowering of the vitality resulting from such poisoning is favorable to the development of cancer and tuberculosis.

"At Guy's Hospital Sir William Arbuthnot Lane decided on the heroic plan of removing the diseased organ. A child who appeared in the final stage of what was believed to be an incurable form of tubercular joint disease, was operated on. The lower intestine, with the exception of nine inches, was removed, and the portion left was joined to the smaller intestine.

"The result was astonishing. In a week's time the internal organs resumed all their normal functions, and in a few weeks the patient was apparently in perfect health."

You undoubtedly know, from your own personal experience, how dull and unfit to work or think properly, biliousness and many other apparently simple troubles make you feel. And you probably know, too, that these irregularities, all directly traceable to accumulated waste, make you really sick if permitted to continue.

You also probably know that the old-fashioned method of drugging for these complaints, is at best only partly effective; the doses must be increased if continued, and finally they cease to be effective at all.

It is true that more drugs are probably used for this than all other human ills combined, which simply goes to prove how universal the trouble caused by accumulated waste really is—but there is not a doubt that drugs are being dropped as Internal Bathing is becoming better known—

For it is not possible to conceive until you have had the experience yourself, what a wonderful bracer an Internal Bath really is; taken at night, you awake in the morning with a feeling of lightness and buoyancy that cannot be described—you are absolutely clean, everything is working in perfect accord, your appetite is better, your brain is clearer, and you feel full of vim and confidence for the day's duties.

There is nothing new about Internal Baths except the way of administering them. Some years ago Dr. Chas. A. Tyrrell, of New York, was so miraculously benefited by faithfully using the method then in vogue, that he made Internal Baths his special study and improved materially in administering the Bath and in getting the result desired.

This perfected Bath he called the "J. B. L. Cascade," and it is the one which has so quickly popularized and recommended itself that hundreds of thousands are to-day using it.

Dr. Tyrrell, in his practice and researches, discovered many unique and interesting facts in connection with this subject; these he has collected in a little book, "The What, the Why, the Way of Internal Bathing," which will be sent free on request if you address Chas. A. Tyrrell, M.D., 134 West 65th Street, New York City, and mention having read this in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

This book tells us facts that we never knew about ourselves before, and there is no doubt that every one who has an interest in his or her own physical well-being, or that of the family, will be very greatly instructed and enlightened by reading this carefully prepared and scientifically correct little book.—Advertisement.

A DOCTOR'S EXPERIENCE

Medicine Not Needed in This Case.

It is hard to convince some people that coffee does them an injury! They lay their bad feelings to almost every cause but the true and unsuspected one.

But the doctor knows. His wide experience has proven to him that, to some systems, coffee is an insidious poison that undermines the health. Ask him if coffee is a cause of constipation, stomach and nervous troubles.

"I have been a coffee drinker all my life, and when taken sick two years ago with nervous prostration, the doctor said that my nervous system was broken down and that I would have to give up coffee.

"I got so weak and shaky I could not work, and reading an advertisement of Postum I asked my grocer if he had any of it. He said, 'Yes,' and that he used it in his family and it was all it claimed to be.

"So I quit coffee and commenced to use Postum steadily, and in about two weeks I could sleep better and get up in the morning feeling fresh. In about two months I began to gain flesh. I weighed only 146 pounds when I commenced on Postum and now I weigh 167 and feel better than I did at 20 years of age.

"I am working every day and sleep well at night. My two children were coffee drinkers, but they have not drank any since Postum came into the house, and are far more healthy than they were before." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Postum comes in two forms:

Postum Cereal—the original form—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—a soluble powder—dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water, and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

Both kinds are equally delicious and cost about the same per cup.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

The company's 5 per cent. bonds and three-year 6 per cent notes are highly recommended to conservative investors by the banking house of N. W. —MISSIONARY J. M. L. HARROW of Cape Palmas, Liberia, West Africa, writes that the work is going slowly at present. The rice crop last year was practically a failure, and everywhere the people are suffering, a hitherto unknown experience in that section, Mr. Harrow states, and he has lived there twenty years. The work of this missionary is conducted among five tribes, and everywhere the same condition prevails. Mr. Harrow asks an interest in the prayers of the Christian Herald readers

TODAY IS THE DAY

By Orison S. Marden

WHEN the Children of Israel were passing through the desert they were fed with manna fresh every day.
Some of the people did not have faith enough to trust the Lord to feed them every day, and so they tried to store up some of this manna for future use; but it spoiled. This taught the Israelites a lesson of faith. They could not keep the manna for the future; they must trust the great Giver of all good. They must have faith that he would feed them every day. Our happiness is like this manna. We must gather it anew every day we live.

Everywhere we see people who have tried to store up what was intended for their daily happiness, as manna for the future. But they are surprised to find that it has spoiled, evaporated, would not keep—that it must be used as we go along. We must use happiness when fresh, like fresh plucked flowers.

There are a great many things, such as good impulses, which are good for today, but not for tomorrow. How many people delay the kindness, the expression of love, until the person is dead, beyond their reach, and then try to atone for a neglected past by flowers and tears at the funeral!

What makes you think that you are going to do wonderful things tomorrow when today seems so commonplace, so void of opportunity? Why does today look so prosy, tomorrow so rosy, so poetic?

What reason have you to believe that you are going to be ideally happy and harmonious, unselfish and helpful at some indefinite time in the future, when today you are irritable and selfish, uncharitable and unhappy? How is it that in some distant future you expect to get so much time to write letters to your friends and to those who are sick and discouraged, and also to devote to self-improvement, to broadening your mind, when you can find no time for these things to-day?

TODAY is the day to say the kind word that springs to your lips, to obey the generous impulse that stirs your heart. These people who haunt your mind, and whom you promise yourself that you will help some time, need your help now, and you can give it more readily now than at any other time. Every tomorrow has, in addition to its own cares and duties, all those which were neglected in the past, while its opportunities and possibilities are no greater than were those of yesterday.

Many a man defers his happiness until he gets rich. Then he is surprised to find that his manna is spoiled, that he should have eaten it when first given.
Deferred happiness and the deferred good deed do not keep.

There is only one way really to live, and that is to start out every morning with a firm resolution to get the most out of that day, to live it to the full.
No matter what happens or does not happen, what comes or does not come, resolve that you will extract from every experience of the day something of good, something that will make you wiser, and show you how to make a few less mistakes tomorrow. Say to yourself,
"This day I begin a new life. I will forget everything in the past that caused me pain, grief, or disgrace."

I once knew a mother who, after death had taken away every one of her children, her husband and nearly all her relatives, prayed that death might relieve her from her awful suffering; but after a few years she was cheerful and happy again, consoled in helping others. There were too many who needed her mothering. The world did not seem so black and life such a failure as she thought it would be.

Nature is marvelously kind to us.
She is a great physician. She puts "the healing balm of Gilead" on all our wounds and cures our mental ills in a wonderful way. If it were not for this great healing potency of nature, the world would be funereal enough, for there are few of us who have not been

AGENCY DEPARTMENT

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

Bible House, New York

borne down very close to the sorrow of death.

Resolve every morning that you will get the most out of that day, not of some day in the future when you are better off, when you have a family, when your children are grown up, when you have overcome your difficulties. You will never overcome them all. You will never be able to eliminate all the things which annoy, trouble, and cause friction in your life. You will never get rid of all the little enemies of your happiness, the hundred and one little annoyances, but you can make the most of things as they are.

The reason why our lives are so lean and poverty-stricken, so disappointing and ineffective, is because we do not really live in the day; we do not concentrate our energy, our ambition, our attention, our enthusiasm, upon the day we are living.

Resolve to enjoy yourself today. Enjoy today, and do not let the hideous shadows of tomorrow, the forebodings, and the things you dread, rob you of what is yours today—your inalienable right to be happy today.

JUST have a little heart-to-heart talk with yourself every morning, and say: "It does not matter what comes or what goes today, what happens or what does not happen, there is one thing that I am sure of, and that is, I am going to get the most possible out of the day. I am not going to allow anything to rob me of my happiness, or of my right to live this day from beginning to end, and not merely to exist."

"I do not care what comes, I shall not allow any annoyance, any happening, any circumstance which may cross my path today to rob me of my peace of mind. I will not be unhappy today, no matter what occurs. I am going to enjoy the day to its full, live the day completely. This day shall be a complete day in my life. I shall not allow the enemies of my happiness to mar it. No misfortune in the past, nothing which has happened to me in days gone by, which has been disagreeable or tragic, no enemies of my happiness or efficiency, shall be a guest in my spirit's sacred enclosure today. Only happy thoughts, joy thoughts, only the friends of my peace, comfort, happiness, and success, shall find entertainment in my soul this day. None of my enemies shall gain admittance to scrawl their hideous autographs on the walls of my mind. There shall be 'no admittance' today, except to the friends of my best moods. I will tear down the black, sable pictures and hang pictures of joy and gladness, of things which will encourage, cheer, and increase my power. Everything which ever handicapped my life, which has made me uncomfortable and unhappy, shall be expelled, at least for this day."

Remember that yesterday is dead. Tomorrow is not yet born. The only time that belongs to you is the passing moment. One might liken the sixty minutes in the hour to flowers, that live for only sixty seconds and then die. If we get the good that belongs to us here and now, we must extract the sweetness of each passing minute while it is ours. That is the real art of living in the today.

Still Going to Church

CENTRAL CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH of Worcester, Mass., is the mother church of the modern Go-to-Church Band movement. Six years ago it was nearly childless, but the interest in persistent church-going has added to the congregation until now the average audience has 31 per cent. of those one would class as children. There were 109 members of the Band who did not fail for the four months ending with May, and a number of these were adults.

The churches for years have been spending labor and money in large measure to get the children to attend Sunday school and the adults to go to church, but the Go-to-Church Band movement is the first serious attempt at a simple and workable scheme for getting the child to desire to attend church, to want to go so hard that tears come if illness prevents. The preacher can be just as prosy as ever, and still the young people will persist in their attendance if given the chance, but it is a stolid preacher indeed who fails to respond to an influx that adds a large number of young and eager minds to his audience.

This easily operated and efficient plan will be carefully explained to anybody upon request by Clinton Alvord, 7 Summer Street, Worcester, Mass.

Battle Flags of the Civil War Carried by Veterans

THE stirring beat of drums! There is something in us that answers to the call of the drums! There is something primeval still within us that stirs in our veins as that rhythmic beating of the dauntless drumheads strikes our ears. We leave our dinner table, our office desk, our schoolroom class, our basket of mending, to go to the door or the window when the drums call. We wait for their approach down the street; we are not out to the sidewalk; we crowd to the curb; something tingles through all our nerves. Crashing suddenly they come abreast of us. Their notes beat into our brain and into our heart and into our memories. Behind them come three men abreast. They carry high a fluttering flag. Something surges up within us. The beat of the drum takes hold on our feet until we scarce can restrain them from following. We cheer and cheer again. We watch the flag as it proudly passes on. With shining eyes we watch the marching men who follow the flag. We greet our neighbors on the curb, when the last marcher has passed from sight, with a peculiar friendliness. Back to our mending and our class and our desk and our waiting dinner we go, better for the tasks ahead. The stirring beat of the drums!

Let Us Keep Peace

gray-haired women who had waited for them fifty years ago to come back, God willing, from the maelstrom of war. This was a beautiful sight. And they marched slowly, too, because of little feet that pattered along with the idols of their hearts, those grandfather veterans of a war that set one people free and made a free people one.

THE thrill of the drums! The thrill of those slowly marching veterans! What memories they awakened! What a panorama of great events that marked the mighty growth of a country, a homeland, a free land! And of all the epochal events in that great history, none is so packed with interest as the period of the Civil War. No name is more revered than the name of Lincoln. None are more honored in our memories than the veterans of that war, of that great civil strife, which, as President Wilson reminded these men, "instead of destroying, healed; instead of making a permanent division, made a permanent union."

SO the air was charged with patriotism. There on the sidewalks of Washington the nation saluted its heroes. It did not glorify war, but it did not refuse the title of hero to those who through war had preserved us a nation. In the ten thousand men who passed the reviewing stand the watchers saw the hundreds of thousands who fifty years before had passed before President Johnson with victorious carriage but saddened hearts. The absence of the great Emancipator mellowed triumph with grief. When here and there a very aged or a very feeble veteran tottered and fell, unable to make the distance, the crowds about him saw the thousands who fell under the withering fire of the battlefield. When the tireless ambulances rushed to and fro to carry veterans who had been overcome to the temporary hospital of the encampment, those who looked on saw the thousands who were carried from the scenes of carnage through those bloodiest three years. And when the shreds of tattered battle flags were carried proudly past the reviewing stand, men and women saw upon that panorama of the mind heroes on a hundred plains cheering their fellows on into the jaws of death that a nation might live.

AND now here they were, fifty years afterward. Here they were, the very same men, some of them in the very same garments. Here they were again marching up that proud avenue to salute and be saluted by the head of the nation. And before them went the stirring drums. The stirring drums that emptied the houses and filled the sidewalks to the curb. That set something to moving in our veins, something to thrilling along our nerves, something to blurring our eyes.

THESE marchers who brought us face to face and hand to hand with the days of '61 could not keep step as before to the beat of the drums. They marched slowly, these gray-haired heroes. Some of them the more slowly because of crutches. Some of them the more slowly because to their arms clung LEAR, crisp day at the national capital, throngs upon throngs of holiday-makers, drums, flags and marching veterans of the war. Who could remain unmoved at such a time? Why, here before us are those of us who knew the Civil War only through our histories, here before us are the very men who fought in that tremendous conflict. There is something sacred about these marchers. They were the saviors of the Union. They had gone forth young men, part of that host which had responded to the call for volunteers. They had been a part of those terrific charges, those hand-to-hand battles, those mighty cataclysms of carnage. They had been with Grant. They had preserved the Union. They had come up from the fields of the slain, and with flying banners and beating drums had marched proudly in tattered garments up this same broad avenue, to salute and be saluted by the head of the nation. They had drunk the cup of mortal combat to the dregs, and they had quaffed the wine of glory. Then in a day they had been absorbed in the common round of life.

incidental. The re-unions, the speeches, the dinners, the special features in the parade, who were there as guests of honor, what they did and said, all these things will be the talk of the G. A. R. camps and homes for many a day. But they were incidental only in this event; this fiftieth anniversary of the Grand Review of 1865. What the countless multitudes along the line of march saw was a spectacle of honor, a memorial spectacle of hundreds of thousands of men who had dared the hell of war to give their country the heaven of peace.

Yes Lest We Forget

AT the camp-fires and dog-watches in Washington during the Forty-ninth Annual Encampment week, many a tale of heroism, of comradeship, of kindness to an enemy, of homecomings and farewells were told. But even among the men who lived through the dark years of war, who charged through those infernos of shot and shell, who languished in prisons or who dragged out weary weeks in hospitals, much of the terror of those days is forgotten. Such is the temper of our human mind that it loses the impress of unpleasant things and holds only the things that were lightened by some ray of hope or kindness. But some things we must remember.

Some of us lived through the nightmare of '61 to '65. Some of us were born near enough to the days of reconstruction to have heard the tale of horrors from those who had not forgotten and could not forget. The history of those four years was written in blood, carved in agony and saturated with tears. Certain names stand out from the welter of those years like the livid mark of the branding-iron on the quivering flesh of its victim. Fair Oaks, Vicksburg, Antietam, Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Manassas, Lookout Mountain, Chickamauga, the Wilderness, Atlanta and the March to the Sea, each left a monument of broken hearts and thousands of nameless graves. Each year more men were killed, more were maimed for life, more contracted disease which they could not shake off during the rest of their lives, yet the war went on unchecked. When at the surrender of Lee and Johnston marked the end of the Confederacy, there had been more than 200 clashes worthy of being recorded as separate actions, and nearly 150 of these were battles in which at least 5,000 men lost their lives.

In the Peninsular Campaign the Federal army lost 16,000 men killed and wounded, the Confederates 18,000. At Antietam, the end of Lee's bold attempt to invade the North, the Federals lost 12,500 and the Confederates 10,000. At Gettysburg, the turning point of Lee's second attack on the North, the Federals lost 23,000 out of 80,000 men engaged, and Lee lost 25,000 out of 75,000; in the Wilderness campaign of 1864 Grant lost 50,000 men out of 120,000. These were all decisive battles, but the decision was dearly bought. Altogether during the war the Union armies enlisted 2,859,192 men, the Southern armies probably about a million and a half. At the beginning of the war the armies were almost equal in number; by January 1, 1863, the Union armies outnumbered the Confederates three to two and the Confederate strength was at its maximum. When Lee surrendered to Grant on April 9, 1865, he had only 28,000 men in his command, and the total of the Southern armies had been reduced to about 175,000, while the Union armies had 1,000,510 men in active service. The Union navy was kept at about the same strength throughout the war, 122,000 men.

The records of the Confederacy were poorly kept and statistics are not available as to their total losses. On the Union side 67,058 men were killed in action, 432

A War Jaunt in Serbia By GEORGE KENNETH END

MR. END, one of the first to return to this country of the Columbia College Relief Expedition sent by the Committee of Mercy into Serbia last summer to stamp out typhus and help in establishing hygienic conditions, tells here a remarkable story of conditions in that storm-center of the war. It was upon Serbia that the war first broke. At the present moment Serbia occupies a peculiar position as in a sense the key to the Balkan situation. Least among all of the warring nations in strength and importance perhaps, this little country is nevertheless foremost in the news of the moment. Mr. End gives us at firsthand an unaffected pen picture, straight from the first battle ground of the war in Europe.

WE REACHED the Serbian border July 23, 1915, after a trip of 20 days to Salonique, Greece, where we laid up five days and then went on to Nish, Serbia. We were put up in the second reserve hospital at Nish, our tents and equipment being with the automobiles which were detained in Greece. The automobiles were sent two weeks before the expedition sailed, but we were there ten days before any of the machines arrived. The delay was occasioned by the extraordinary duty levied by the Greek government on the passage of the automobiles into Serbia. This is an example of one of the petty jealousies which exist between the two countries.

The sum of three per cent of the value was the tax they placed on the machines. As the machines were to be used for relief work in Serbia, the officials in Serbia delayed payment, trying to prevail upon the Greek government to forego the tax, but without avail.

On the arrival of our automobiles, August 2, the members of the expedition unloaded crates, partly assembled the cars and pushed them up to our camp. (All Fords.) Out of the wood from the crates the bodies of the machines were constructed. We painted them, placed the sign of the Committee of Mercy upon them, and then were ready for our real work. A few of the machines were immediately pressed into service going to Skopje. Some went to the southeast end of Serbia, others went as far as the Albanian border on the southwest.

MANY little side excursions were permitted us by the Serbian government. In this way I secured many pictures of the country, and much intimate knowledge of the conditions. . . . I went to the French aviation unit at a place called Banjitsa, close to Belgrade, just three miles back from the Danube to protect it from the bomb fire. The aviators I met gave me the freedom of the whole reservation. They permitted me to take what pictures I desired, and granted every wish except that of making a flight. There were James Du Rothschild, the famous aviator, and M. Bonamour du Tartie and M. Louis Hamiaux. I also met Captain Paulhan. I sat in his machine, which a few days before had been in a fight with an Austrian plane ending in victory for the Frenchman. He told me the story of this encounter. . . . "I was flying over the Danube just east of Belgrade on the morning of August 11. It was just day-break. There was a haze. I was reconnoitering and making observations of the Austrian positions, when a large plane appeared above me. I did not know it, did not hear it as the noise of my engine drowns out all other sound. Something however attracted my attention skyward, and there it was, equipped for my destruction, an observer ready with a machine gun. The aviator had received his instructions to fly directly over my machine. He had done his work well before I observed him. Then I rose rapidly and succeeded in getting above the Austrian before the observer could get into action effectively. I took a shot at the aviator, but missed him, wounding the observer. The Austrian pilot opened on me. I had a Hotchkiss machine gun on a tripod so arranged that I could operate it without jeopardizing my safety. I got on the level with the enemy and shot at his machine with one round of fire from the machine gun. The machine had started volplaning down toward the river on the Austrian side. My object was to get him before he reached the lines. I succeeded in hitting him, he lost control and the machine plunged into the Danube. Just before he reached the water I came down near enough to get a photograph of the machine plunging into the Danube."

Such was the remarkable tale told me as I stood watching some of the French machines soaring toward the enemy's camp. Its truth was vouched for by the picture he showed me which told the graphic story in a way words never can. It was one of the most unusual photographs I ever looked at. The river looking like a black streak only broken in its monotony by the crumbling wings of this aeroplane as she dashed into the water, was his only witness to vouch for the truth of this story. His camera had done its work well and the picture he showed me with the startling details of the encounter in the air was a fit climax to a most unusual fight ending in the Austrians being dashed to death and their machine disappearing under the waters of the Danube. There are eight Farman biplanes in this camp. Each one is equipped with a seventy horse-power eight-cylinder Renault motor and the new model Renault carbureter. It is seventeen and five-tenths meters long (about 55 feet). Its speed maximum is 130 kilometers an hour (65 miles an hour) and they cost about $5,000 each. They are equipped with one Hotchkiss machine gun with a range of 2,000 meters, a tube to drop bombs and a carrying capacity of one pilot, one observer who operates the gun, and room enough to carry about six 120-mm shells.

Up to the time I left they had been established there since May of this year (1915). Reconnoitering over Austrian territory every day, their main work consists of taking observations of the Austrian positions. The number of raids made by these airmen I could not learn, but I know of one which was made while our expedition was there. The aviator, H. Bonamour du Tartie, dropped 30 bombs into Austria from a height of over 9,000 feet. On August 14, one of these pilots flying to another aeroplane base in Central Serbia, lost his direction, thought he was coming down in Serbia but came down on Bulgarian soil where he has been interned.

The Story of a Church that Thrives by Service

By REV. WORTH M. TIPPEY

THE author of this stirring narrative of a church doing live things was the pastor of the church during the ten years under review. He has just recently begun his pastorate of the Epworth Memorial Church, New York City.

The Pastor Who Won

EPWORTH Memorial Church, Cleveland, Ohio, marks the spot where the Epworth League of the Methodist Episcopal Church was organized, and its name indicates a memorial to that event.

The church is semi-downtown, on the crowded east side. Twenty years ago, it was in the center of the business residence quarter of the city. Ten years ago, it began to be downtown, and since then the financial section has moved eastward and to the heights, leaving the church in the midst of boarding-houses, growing business, and private residences.

When I came to Epworth ten years ago, I faced a difficult task: a membership moving out of the territory, with general belief that under such circumstances the church also must move or fail. I have seen five churches, in our neighborhood, either close outright or move east, in the ten years. Epworth, in spite of heavy losses, has grown in that period from 1,000 members to 1,700, with 2,600 in organizations; the budget from $11,000 to $25,000; the salaried staff from five to ten workers, inclusive of director of music, organist, chorians and housekeeper; while the influence of the church has greatly extended.

The church has become, in a modest way, a guide and an inspiration to many persons in various states, even in mission lands.

THE main things we undertook to do ten years ago may be summed up as follows: To bring up, gradually, every department of the church to a high and uniform strength and efficiency; to perfect the business management of the church, including the enlargement of the office; especially the accounting for persons, and to educate the people in giving; to make the official board a power, and to democratize the church; to push up parish visitation to great lengths, uniting church and Sunday school visitation, under the direction of a salaried worker of high pastoral efficiency; to stress the Sunday school and the club work with children and young people; to fill the church with ministries of kindness to everybody, but especially to the aged, unemployed, young people and those in distress; to organize and enlarge the activities of the church; to push out the church into the common religious, civic and social movements of the city; to make the building a great gathering-place for people, open every day and night, with real friendly and useful activities; to throw the church into the fight for a better and juster world; to make the spirit of the church free, liberal-minded, unsectarian, unafraid; to create a daily and weekly evangelism based on Sunday services and prayer meetings of spiritual power and personal work; to do the spiritual and social work in a passion of love as the great gospel of the kingdom of God.

It is a serious program; but we accomplished it all, and more largely than we dreamed. The church caught fire under it; grew steadily, drew people from all over the city, acquired an organization and a momentum. Every item in the program was important and one can scarcely emphasize the value of one as above the others.

AS an illustration of bringing up the church to a strength and efficiency, we departmentalized the Sunday school; put in the graded system; organized teacher-training; added a beginners' department; pushed up the clubs for boys, girls, and young people, uniting them finally with the Sunday school; increased the adult classes from two to nine; put missionary instruction and social service into the classes; created a powerful Sunday school evangelism, including thorough instruction of converts. The same sort of work was done with the twenty departments of the church's work.

The work of visitation was reorganized and yoked to evangelism under the leadership of Rev. W. I. Shattuck, associate pastor, assisted by pastor, deaconess, directors of clubs, teachers of classes and selected people from the congregation. Classes were organized to look after their own sick, to visit strangers, to work for the conversion of unconverted members. Personal evangelism was also carried into Epworth League, Women's Association, and Men's Club; into Scouts, Campfire Girls; into church socials and annual Yuletide Festival; with the result that for three years the church has not failed to receive people for a single Sunday, and we have received annually at Easter from eighty-six to one hundred and seven. Last year, the tenth year of the "program," was the largest ingathering of all—over three hundred.

Ministries of kindness are vastly important in any church. At Epworth they include regular visitation of aged, sick and shut-ins, including remembrance of birthdays for shut-ins, with visitation by pastors and people, flowers and little services in homes. The church helps its young people to get started, and by its contact with stores, offices and factories, in seeking employment for the unemployed of the parish, is able frequently to advance its young people who are already employed. This adds to its civic work.

A Memorial Committee was added to the standing committees of the Official Board. Its duties are to go at once to homes of death, in order to offer the sympathy and assistance of the church; to send flowers in the name of the church; to present resolutions at the next Board meeting, a copy of which is sent to the family. If the family is strange the committee and the church office see that friends are present. If the family is poor, as when the breadwinner dies, the Charities Council takes charge and gets under the family. This committee has been a wonderful influence for brotherhood in the church.

This Charities Council consists of ten friendly visitors, a lawyer, several dentists and physicians, and is presided over by the deaconess, who is the social worker of the church. It takes care of needy families in the membership and congregation, along principles of scientific relief. The church sets out to save drunkards and to bring dependent families to self-support, doing as little giving as possible and as much thinking, and keeping in close touch with Associated Charities and city Outdoor Relief.

Our relations to the city have been a great joy to us. Instead of being censorious and aloof, we set out to be sympathetic and to work. I personally took places on committees and movements down town, and then got my people to doing the same. We joined in civic and charitable campaigns, and made the church a center of citizenship. We have been a part of most of the large things of importance that have been done in Cleveland for the last five or six years.

IN ENLARGING the church as a social center, we set out to make the largest use of the building, with the idea that for a church to stand idle is as bad as for an office building to be unrented. We also undertook to organize the church by natural age groups, just as we have the Men's Club and the Women's Association. That in itself filled the church with organized, supervised gatherings, and drew in the neighborhood; until, with a membership of 1,700, the church has 2,600 in its organizations, is open every day, and usually with several simultaneous gatherings.

One great lesson we have learned is on the business side of the church. It is to keep as careful records of persons—to the last child in the Sunday school and the last baby in the home—as of moneys. Most churches look after the last penny, but are slack in their accounting for persons. This has enlarged the work of the church office, increased secretarial help, cost money, but it has proven out as one of the vital phases of the work.

The growth of the work forced the reconstruction of the building in 1912 at a cost of $45,000. A new dining-room was built to seat 500 about tables, and as part of a suite of five social rooms, including a large and beautiful Friendship Room, the gift of a member.

A suite of recreational rooms was also created, including gymnasium, den, athletic office, and separate shower and locker rooms for the two sexes. All athletic activities are under salaried direction.

The crowning source of power of the church has been the union of the spiritual and social; the point of view of the salvation of the individual and the reconstruction of society as one glorious movement of the kingdom of God. We have looked out upon an oncoming Christian world and not a hopelessly corrupt and doomed society. We have been sympathetic to the great normal interests of humanity, and not afraid of them; counted them sacred and not ungodly. We have believed that the forces of goodness are powerful enough to leaven, and after a while to purify and uplift the world.

Among the Workers

OPENING the 35th convention of the General Council of the Lutheran church held at Rock Island in September, President Schmunk said: "We meet under circumstances which never before have confronted the Lutheran Church in its history, or our fathers in particular. The Christian world is clouded and ablaze with war. The Lutheran Church, especially that large part constituted by our brethren in Germany, Austria and surrounding nationalities, and that large part so contiguous to the fields of battle and scenes of unrest, constituted by our brethren in Sweden, Norway, Denmark and Finland, is one of the greatest sufferers."

In many regions, churches, schools, seminaries, and almost closed, vast voluntary missionary operations are at a standstill and whatever our blood affiliations may be, or wherever our sympathies may lie, there is scarce one person of the million or more souls we represent here at Rock Island, whose heart is untouched by the woes unutterable that come to us from distant lands. God be praised that the Stars and Stripes still wave above us as our earthly protector, untouched in honor, and up to this present moment unspotted with blood."

WE ARE making an every member canvass of our Kachek Christians. We are not going to stop until we get every member to pledge a definite sum yearly or weekly. In a great many places we have more than doubled the contributions, and we have only begun. Each Christian takes his cash and wraps it up in paper and puts his name and amount on the outside. As the Chinese say, a person does not like to wrap up less than five or ten cash, and one does not want to drop in loose cash when every one else has his wrapped up in paper."

(Rev.) DAVID S. TAPPAN, Jr., China.

THIS Spring the city of Liuchow-Fu, Province of Kwangsi, China, was the scene of an opium burning, when ninety-eight packages of opium valued at $4,700 along with 478 pieces of opium outfits and gambling paraphernalia, were destroyed. Two hundred spectators, comprised of students, merchants, soldiers, civilians, and the Yamen retinue, witnessed the scene. Mr. Liu-Kia-Cheng, the local magistrate, superintended the burning in person. Under his energetic administration, opium smoking and gambling have materially decreased. The burning took place within the precincts of one of the old official buildings, formerly occupied by the Provincial Commander-in-Chief. As the flames shot heavenward the crackling of the pipes, the fumes of burning opium, told in no uncertain way of the drastic measures that are being employed by the new officials to suppress the use of the drug. The people in whose possession the opium or gambling outfits were found, received various degrees of punishment corresponding to the circumstances of each case. W. H. OLDFIELD.

A Week in the World's News

THE TYRANT SPACE AGAIN ANNIBILATED. To the layman, the wireless telegraph has always been an inexplicable mystery of roaring coils and spitting sparks. Yet to the wonders of wireless telegraphy over vast spaces has now been added the greater wonder of wireless telephony. On September 29 President Vail of the American Bell Telephone Company spoke into an ordinary telephone receiver at New York. The message was transmitted over the land wires to the United States naval wireless tower at Arlington, where it flashed into the air and was received instantly at the naval tower at Mare Island, San Francisco, a distance of 2,500 miles. As if this were not enough, on the day following speech was transferred by wireless with the same equipment across 1,600 miles to the American wireless station at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii. The Marconi Company made successful experiments in wireless telephony over small distances in 1912. The present triumph, however, is the result of independent work on the part of experts of the American Bell Telephone Company and of the United States navy. The wireless telephone is not yet ready for immediate commercial use. Further experiment may be necessary before John in Chicago can call up Mary in New York and talk to her through intervening space, but that it will come may be considered probable, although land wires will not be done away with. The wireless telegraph has come into wide and profitable use, yet the cables are still overworked. The same conditions will no doubt prevail with regard to the telephone. The wireless electric light is the next. It has been done, but the cost is prohibitive.

THE WORLD'S GREATEST FOREIGN LOAN. The loan which the British and French Commission have been seeking to negotiate in America as a means of paying allied debts to this country was reported on Wednesday, September 29, to have been arranged on a basis of five-year bonds to be sold at a price to yield nearly 5.8 per cent. and to be convertible into fifteen and twenty-five year bonds at 4½ per cent. after five years. The amount of the loan is said to have been arranged at $500,000,000, to be sold to the bankers underwriting it at 96 and resold to investors at 98. The London Times says: "This is the largest external loan ever floated in any country." In parts of the United States the loan has not been popular. The banks as a whole have shown a disposition to consider it favorably, as a matter of good business. The first day on which the loan was offered registered a number of large subscriptions, and it is now thought that the loan will be fully subscribed before the end of the sixty days provided for by the underwriting arrangement.

TO INCREASE OUR SUBMARINE FLEET. Nine companies made bids for the construction of sixteen new-type submarines authorized under the Naval Appropriations Act of 1915. The bids were opened on September 30 before a considerable assemblage of interested naval officials and representatives of ship-building companies and of the Bethlehem Steel Works. The offers ran from $510,000 to $550,000 for each submarine, the latter amount being the maximum allowed under the act. One to two years will be required to complete the sixteen new boats. Interest in the subject was manifested by the number of new models which were suggested. The specifications call for boats of fourteen knots on the surface and eleven knots submerged, each submarine to have quarters for about twenty men and space for stores for thirty days. The comparison of the bids with their varying specifications will determine the successful bidders.

RUSSIAN PEASANTS WANT PERMANENT PROHIBITION. Before the recent dissolution of the Russian Duma by order of the Czar, the peasant deputies proposed the enactment of a perpetual prohibition law. In a formal statement proposing the law they first recall the terms of the decrees of October, 1914, under which prohibition came to Russia, and then bear this witness to the benefits of abstinence: "Then a miracle was wrought on Russian soil. The long-cherished dream of the Russian people was realized; the age-long curse of Russia was vanquished. Shame upon those who say that abstinence is impossible among us; that it cannot be enforced by prohibition, and that without the 'drink budget' the finances of the country will be wrecked! The year that has just passed has shown that abstinence has completely regenerated our people. Crime in general has diminished; there is less brigandage and begging; there are fewer convicts in our prisons; the hospitals are no longer crowded; peace is restored in family life; the production of labor has been augmented; there is more thrift. After all this, to all right-thinking people, to all who sincerely love their country, it ought to be clear that the happiness and greatness of Russia are bound up with prohibition, and that it is the sacred duty of every one to make it certain that this abstinence shall be perpetual."

ANOTHER HURRICANE SAVAGES GULF COAST. A windstorm traveling at the rate of 120 to 130 miles an hour at one point in its course, and somewhere between 60 and 90 miles most of the time, swept upon New Orleans and nearby regions September 29 with disastrous results. Nearly 400 people are reported lost, many of them by drowning, others by the collapse of buildings. Two men were blown overboard from a steamship anchored near the mouth of the Mississippi. CENSORS NEED MORE TIME. For military reasons, the British and French governments, it is announced, will delay the transmission of cablegrams and telegrams to all neutral countries in Europe and also to Russia 48 hours. Private messages for Switzerland are provisionally suspended altogether. News agencies and governmental officials are exempt from this new ruling, which was made on September 30 to remain in force pending further notice.

DECORATES AMERICAN PHYSICIANS. The members of the Rockefeller Foundation Commission, composed of sanitary engineers and physicians, which was despatched to Serbia to assist the authorities there in getting the upper hand of typhus and other diseases, have, to-

At any rate he figures that 1,000 of the world be built for the cost of one super-dreadnought and that this number would make our fleet absolutely secure unless the enemy had so many fast torpedo boats, in which case the little fleet would be in danger. This danger would meet by using longer range torpedoes until still faster craft appeared. It is a beautiful dream, and seems to offer unlimited possibilities for improvement; not only that, but with enough inventors working at it it may come true.

NEW FRENCH CREDIT. The French Senate on Tuesday approved the new national credit 6,240,000,000 francs ($1,240,000,000) to provide for the expense of national defense for the last three months of this year.

DUMBA INCIDENT ENDED. The British Ambassador handed to the American Secretary of State on September 30 a safe conduct for Dr. Constantin Theodor Dumba, the recalled ambassador from Austria. The safe conduct for Madame Dumba was received several days ago, and Dr. and Madame Dumba arranged to sail for Holland on the 5th of October.

HAITI NOW AT PACE. The revolution in Haiti which caused the landing of American forces under Rear-Admiral Caperton some weeks ago and ended armed intervention, has brought about a new treaty, now in force, by which the United States will control the finances and guarantee the peace of Haiti. The revolution came to an end on September 29 when General Petion, the leader, in return for arms for all his forces, surrendered his arms. All Haitians now under arms will be treated as bandits. For more than two years Haiti has been in continual insurrection. None of the revolutionary movements have presented anything more than the aspirations of certain politicians toward power and their desire to control the money chest. The arrangement with the United States is very acceptable to all of the responsible elements in Haiti, and will probably result in the same stability of government which now rules in Santo Domingo where similar conditions were cured by the same means.

A SHAKE-UP IN THE WEST. Five of our western states felt their foundations tremble on October 3 on a slip in the Wasatch Fault, Utah, extending about 150 miles north and south along that range of mountains, caused a series of earthquakes. Considerable damage was done along the Utah Pacific Railroad in Nevada, according to reports, and in various sections inhabited by their dwellings. Utah, Nevada, California, Oregon and Idaho record having felt the shocks.

A STORY THAT IS PROBABLY TRUE AND OUGHT TO BE. A news item appeared in the press attributed to Bishop William F. Anderson of the Methodist Episcopal church who, according to the account, was told by a senator who heard it from one of the cabinet members that at a recent meeting "with the President arrived, his face wore a solemn look. It was evident that serious affairs of the nation were on his mind. He said to the Cabinet members 'I don't know whether you men believe in prayer or not. I do. Let us pray and the help of God'; and right there the President of the United States fell upon his knees and the members of the Cabinet did the same, and the President offered a prayer to God." This is not time to verify this story before repeating it in the Christian Herald. It at least suggests that our Presidents appear to overlook seeking that valuable qualification in prospective cabinet members, belief in prayer. Speaking of state prayers, we are moved to quote from a recent issue of The Living Church:

"And while the Church cannot suggest the political principles that must underlie the making of treaties of peace, she may well advert to the moral principles that make for peace. She should send a friendly message of sympathy to the national Church of each of the belligerent countries, exhorting each to proclaim anew the goal of love, the principle of justice between nations, the spirit of internationalism. If the Church of England would thus pray seriously and humbly for the Kaiser and the people of Germany and the German Churches would pray really earnestly and meaningfully for the King and the people of Great Britain, there would be introduced the spiritual antidote to the gospel of hate, and we believe, it would be the beginning of the end of the war."

And yet among those very hills
Men fight and die.

The reason why!

and outlying points was cut off, and resumption of full railroad service to New Orleans was declared to be unlikely for weeks. People fled to the high lands. Property damage is estimated at millions. Loss of life and damage to property extended to adjacent states. The hurricane was one of the worst known on the Gulf. A recent issue of the Christian Herald gave a clear diary of the career of such storms.

THE PRESIDENT AT HOME TO FIVE THOUSAND. President Wilson shook hands with approximately five thousand G. A. R. veterans and their wives, who rushed to the White House on the occasion of a reception the President had planned for certain organizations at the forty-ninth annual encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic. The false report had gone around that all G. A. R. visitors were expected. Bureau men swindled a great many of these visitors by selling them badges for twenty-five cents which were warranted to gain them admittance, and the President, recognizing the genuineness of the interest felt in him as the head of the nation, altered his plans and admitted the unexpected delegation.

NEW YORK'S HIGH VALUATION OF ITSELF. The new tax lists of New York City commercial and real estate shows an assessed valuation of $12,000,000,000. The 1915 valuation for real estate was just over $8,000,000,000, and this has increased by about $400,000,000 only. The great jump in valuations has been in personal property, which is assessed as around $4,000,000,000 as against less than a tenth of that amount in 1915. This immense figure, however, will be greatly reduced by one method or another during the progress of collecting the tax. The huge increase had been expected by officials and forecasted in a recent declaration by the mayor that economy in expense and a big lift in income would be required to take care of the 1916 budget. Justification for more than a tenfold increase in the value of personal property, however, is not very clear. It is just possible that a bona fide increase in personal wealth to somewhere near that extent will be found to be the cause. [Right alongside of this news report in the New York Times of October 1 appeared an almost equally gether with some representatives of the American Red Cross to a total number of forty-three, been recognized for their services by the Serbian government, Crown Prince Alexander having bestowed decorations upon them.

HUMAN ROADS AND BRIDGES. In the tremendous drive which the Allies began at the close of September in the north of France, 50 men fell every minute, according to a news despatch. The accounts of this sudden and widespread eruption of shot and shell state that trenches became filled with German bodies; streams into which Germans were driven were clogged by their bodies; and over such terrible paths to "glory" poured the victorious soldiers of the Allied armies. This fearful news comes from just across the ocean a distance not half as great as that which has now been spanned by kindly human voices by wireless telephony. The scenes described have doubtless been witnessed in other areas of the war. One authority estimates the German losses to date at five and one quarter million, and for all the nations probably in the neighborhood of thirteen million men. Against this ghastly total how inconsequential seems the death of thirty-one persons in a sudden hurricane. The latter news is heralded in headlines, shouting the number of the dead; the unspeakable awfulness of the work of one day's battling in Europe is heralded in the headlines whichever side is winning, as "A Great Victory," "New Gains" by one or the other of those suicidal nations.

A NEW FISH-BOAT. Edward F. Chandler, inventor and naval expert, is reported by the New York Times to have completed plans for a one-man torpedo boat to be so small and to travel so fast as to be an almost impossible target for guns of any description. It is to be gasoline-propelled, and the operator will travel with his boat partly submerged until he gets nearly within striking distance, when by some simple manipulation he will go beneath the waves, sight his periscope on the enemy vessel, and by the pressure of a foot release one of the two torpedoes carried under the bilge of his craft. The inventor does not say how the man will get his boat back on the surface; or whether the craft will be like some of the insect pests, and bite once and die.

NOT A FAVORABLE SEASON FOR INTERNATIONAL CONVENTIONS. The executive committee of the World's Sunday School Association has decided to postpone the proposed Eighth World's Sunday School Convention, which was to have been held in Tokyo in October, 1916, until some date after the close of the war. Fifty-eight nations were represented at Zurich in 1913 but under conditions now prevailing many of these nations would not now send delegates, and those that were sent would have great diffically in reaching their destination. When conditions permit the convention will be held, and held in Tokyo.

MATERIAL NEEDS DO NOT ECLIPSE THE SPIRITUAL. The receipts of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions for the year ending August 31 were $1,101,565.17, the largest in its history, in spite of the business sluggishness and the great American contributions to relieve bodily distress in countries ravaged by war.

RESTORES WASHINGTON'S WILL TO VIRGINIA. Ever since the inventory of the collections of the late J. P. Morgan revealed in his possession the will of Martha Washington, the State of Virginia has been seeking to secure possession of this document. Judge James Keith of the Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals announced, on September 29, that he had received the will from J. P. Morgan, Jr., with instructions to make such disposition of it as would be pleasing to the State of Virginia.

GRAFTERS CAN NOT ALWAYS WIN. Although the graft disclosures in San Francisco in 1906-07 sent Abe Ruef to San Quentin and deposed Mayor Schmitz, the element which these men represented has persistently sought to regain control of the municipality. This year Schmitz dared again to become a candidate for the office he had disgraced; and many people feared that he might succeed. In the primary election of September 29, Schmitz was effectively beaten, and James Rolph, Jr., will succeed himself as mayor of the city by the Golden Gate.

COMMERCE HALTS WAR. There are times in the war zone when the feeling of friendship, even between those who have been deadly combatants, seems to overshadow everything else. A trifle may bring it to the surface. An illustration of this character is furnished by a correspondent, who tells of an experience between two lines of trenches, one English and the other

THE BOYS AT THE FRONT ARE NOT FORGOTTEN. In a letter from Professor Dr. Adolf Deismann of Berlin University he describes the extent of the field postal service of the German army, and gives a fair idea of what must be the extent of this service for all the countries at war. The professor says: "All of you will admit that the exchange of letters taking place between the home-land and the front is a very important standard for judging the moral, mental and spiritual condition of a people and their fighting armies. Last winter I gave you a number of statistics on this subject, which, after a whole year, I can now supplement. Four billions of field-post letters the German mails have forwarded during the first year of the war. According to official reports there were sent from August, 1914, till the end of July, 1915, in round numbers, 2.4 billions of field-post letters from the people at home to the front. In the field there were mailed about 1.6 billions. About 45,000 mailbags are being daily forwarded to the troops. The Christmas mail 'only' amounted to 29,000 bags. Daily the post office sends out one and one-half million kilos of letters. From July 15, 1870, until the end of March, 1871, the field mail forwarded 104 million letters. Now it manages to send off nearly 15½ million per day—35 times more than in 1870-71. What the fieldpost in 1870 accomplished during eight and one-half months, it does today within a week. The number of defective or imperfect sendings is falling off considerably, though there are still 150,000 field-post letters or parcels daily causing delay because they are either poorly addressed or carelessly wrapped."

THAT OBSTREPEROUS CANAL. Another ready-made dam has slid into the Canal, and reports on October 1 indicated that the seventy-six vessels already waiting transit can not be moved before the middle of the month.

THE new smashing Allied offensive from Flanders to the Vosges swayed forward on Saturday, September 25, and back a little less on Sunday, September 26, and settled down again on Monday to an artillery combat, with operations by infantry at various points. On Monday the British were reported to have penetrated the German second line east of Le and west of Lille, and the French to have made further gains east of Sohez and north of Massiges in the Champagne, on Tuesday. The Germans restored, on Tuesday, some of the lost trenches. The British and French are now concentrating their artillery fire upon the second and third lines of German trenches, beyond the first line now in their hands, attempting to blast the trenches also from the face of the earth. The Allies appear to be generally holding the gains made.

the first line trenches of the French troops. In Champagne, north of Perthes, where the French made their great gain on Saturday, the latter appear to have penetrated the German lines far enough to bring within easy range of their guns the railway running east and west behind the German positions. This railway has been the apparent objective of the whole attack, and if captured would seriously embarrass the commissary and ammunition services of the German armies.

and the British 23, and the total of prisoners is said to reach 23,000, while the total German losses under the attacks and counter-attacks are put by the French at 120,000 men. The Germans claim to have inflicted an equal if not greater loss upon the Allies, and to have captured large numbers of British troops and to have delayed their realizing their object completely.

then realizing their object completely.

Meantime the fighting continues with slight gains for the French in the Champagne country, and the loss of a few advanced trenches by the English east of Loos. Bulgaria, which appeared to be ready to take sides, has seemed to gain new caution from the events of the past week and has announced that her recent mobilization was for the purpose of maintaining her neutrality and that she had no intention of attacking any of her neighbors. The mobilization ordered by Greece continues, the Greek Parliament having authorized a war loan of $30,000,000, and Rumania's army is still kept on a war footing. Sir Edward Grey, the British premier, served notice on Bulgaria through a statement made in the Commons on Tuesday, September 28, that Great Britain and her allies were prepared to give all necessary aid to their friends in the Balkans in case Bulgaria assumed an aggressive attitude. He called attention, however, to the traditional friendship of Bulgaria and Great Britain and asserted that Britain and her allies "sought only to further the national aspirations of the Balkan states without sacrificing the independence of any of them."

If Christ Had Not Come

A SERMON BY REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.*

TEXT: JOHN 1:9-12. "I am come as bread."

"If I had not come!" The very suggestion affects one as we should be affected at a wedding if, when all things were ready, full of light and color, death suddenly came in and claimed the bride, and removed every token of festivity, and turned out the lights. "If I had not come!" In the realization of such a plight we have to transform the world; merely to imagine it we should have to be busy for days and weeks, turning out lights, and darkening windows, and shutting doors, and cutting up literature, and destroying art, and silencing music and song. "If I had not come!" In that suggestion the sweet balmy air becomes a desolating blast. "If I had not come," then yesterday has no passion flower, today has no lilies of peace, tomorrow has no opening rose of glory.

"If I had not come!" It is well for our souls that we should sometimes insert a negative into the great facts of our faith, in order that the very darkness of the supposition may make us realize more keenly the positive content of the truth. Even the Scriptures themselves sometimes hurl these negations upon us, to urge us into a more vigorous and positive grasp of the faith. "If Christ be not risen!" "In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so . . ."; "If Christ had not died." Such negations startle us into vigilance; they make us more alert to the real treasures of our faith; they help to freshen our consciousness of the work of grace; and they startle our dull and reluctant praise into eager and fruitful devotion. Even an imaginary negation may quicken our apprehension of reality. Imagine a loved one dead, and you will discover the space she fills. If she were dead! Imagine your little one gone, and you will know how much of your summer is born of her sun. And imagine that Jesus had never come, wipe out every trace of his gracious mission, and in the contemplation of the desert you may be helped to recover again the glory of the Lord.

A World Without Hope

"If I had not come!" Well, what does the Lord himself say about his coming? Why did he come? What did he come to do? What has he done? Let us listen to one or two of his own statements concerning his mission, and then let us imaginatively annihilate the mission and look round about us in our desolate plight. Listen, then, to the word of the Lord: "The Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which is lost." So that is one statement of the mission of his coming. "To seek and to save that which is lost."

Let us steadily fix our eyes upon that mission. Who else has shared it, except it be the men and women who have lit their lamps at his fire? Indeed, who else has used the word "lost" as he used it? "What man of you having a hundred sheep, if he lose one of them. . . . A lost sheep! Or 'what woman having ten pieces of silver, if she lose one of them. . . . A lost treasure! And then his next parable goes on to explain the parental agony over a lost child. I am sometimes inclined to think that the word "lost" is perhaps the most desolate word in human speech. It is even gloomier than death. It is one thing that your daughter is dead; it would be another thing if she were lost in New York. And that is the word the good Lord uses when he wishes to describe his mission among the children of men. He has come "to seek and to save that which is lost."

And how are they lost? How does one person lose another in this horrible tragedy of forgetfulness? We can test our vital bond of communion with each other by the register of remembrance. If a husband or wife is away in Europe, and the companion of their life is here in New York, we can test their vital communion in the constancy of their remembrance. If the two souls are really bound up in the same bundle of life the memory is rarely vacant; every little while the loved image is back again, and memory hugs it as a joyful guest. And when a deep affection wants to tell its story, and to give its witness in a simple phrase, it often does it in the all-revealing word, "You are never out of my mind." So is it with a deep and true affection.

And now let us lift the reasoning up to even higher relationships. We may test the vitality of our fellowship with God at the register of remembrance. Is our communion so quick and sensitive that we readily think of God, or is it the truth that we readily forget him? So often has it happened that men and women, great in fame and therefore great in moral venture, in the very midst of their chivalrous enterprise could joyfully say: "God is never out of my mind!" God loses us when we forget him. To forget God is to be lost. To begin to forget God is the beginning of alienation; and the deepest cry that rings through the Scriptures is God's cry over his forgetful children: "My people have forgotten me." "This my son is lost."

And the good Lord comes out to seek those who are thus lost in spiritual alienation. And where does he seek them? There are some who are buried in forgetfulness in the noisome grave of lust. There are others who are buried in forgetfulness in the garish blaze of carnal delight. There are others who are buried in forgetfulness in the magnetic mud of material greed. There are others who are buried in forgetfulness in the shimmering mist of pride and vanity, or in the deceptive fogs of jealousy and ill-will. And still there are others who are buried in forgetfulness amid masses of smothering anxieties and cares, or under the waves and billows of grief. And just in these conditions, where people are lost in forgetfulness, the Lord comes "to seek and to save." And, blessed be God, he has sought and found them! He has found them in the graves of lust, and he has lifted them clean out of their corruption. He has found them in the blaze and whirl of carnal pleasure, and he has endowed them with the strength and sanity of his own peace. He has found them up to the mouth and ears in the mud of avarice, and he has lifted them out of their miry clay. He has found them wandering in the mists of vanity, and lost in the fogs of jealousy, and he has recovered them to sweet reasonableness and heavenly love. He has found them overwhelmed with anxieties and cares, and he has graciously led them into his rest. He came to do it. He has done it. He is doing it still. He is seeking and finding "them that are lost," them that have forgotten that they are the children of God.

Let us listen to him again. "I am come as a light into the world." Not like a lamp into a dark room, but like the rising sun upon a landscape held in the bondage of twilight or night. Have you ever watched the sun rise upon some wide and varied panorama? Two or three times have I watched it from the summit of the Rigi. First, the great heights, clothed in everlasting snow, are flushed and illumined. And then the radiance steals down the slopes until the snows are left behind, and the pine woods begin to show in the morning light. Then lower and lower, until a church tower with its dull coronal ball catches the beams and flashes into gold. Still lower and lower passes the illumined gleam until it reaches the chalets, and then the shops and the streets, and then it falls upon the common implements of labor, upon the milk-eans, and upon the oxen and the wain going early afield.

"Light! Light! More Light!"

"I am come as a light into the world." He came to light up the great mountain verities of eternal truth, but also to light up the common homestead, and the daily duty, and the implements of labor, and the humblest and most commonplace toil.

I saw a picture a little while ago, of an old woman gathering sticks in a wood in the early morning. Her road was rough and rutty and filled with pools from the rain that had fallen in the night. But the morning light was shining down the rutty road, and fell on the poor old body and on her bundle of sticks, and the bearer and her burden stood transfigured. And in all this is a symbol of the larger truth. The Lord came as a light to illumine everything, to throw a cheery ray even upon our heavy load.

"I am come as a light into the world." An old countryman once said to me as I walked in the early misty hour of the day: "Yes, it's a bit thick now, but I think it will go away when the sun is up." And so it did; the mists vanished at the touch of the morning sun. And away back in the early days of the Scriptural record, the mists lie thick, and traveling is difficult, for the veil hangs over everything. But "the veil is done away in Christ." "I am come as a light into the world." And the rays of his presence light up everything. See him among a few fishermen by the Galilean Sea! See him with one of the cultured scholars of his day, shedding upon the soul of Nicodemus the glory of a wonderful dawn! See him with the little children! See him with publicans and sinners! See him at a wedding! See him at a grave! And always and everywhere throwing upon everything the sunlight of the noon-day. Now get the recoil of the negative: "If I had not come!" Let the sun sink again. Let every kindly light kindled by his shining be extinguished. Blow out every lamp. Spoke from the consciousness every radiant revelation gave us of God. Blot it all out; then make your way along the road, without the Light of life, and let me hear you sing songs in the night!

Why did he come? "I am the Bread which came down out of heaven." So he comes as our bread. He calls himself "the Bread," life's daily necessity, the secret resource of all endurance, the antidote of faintness, the daily renewer of exhausted strength. "I am the Bread which cometh. . . ." And there are many of us who know the ministry of this mystic Bread, for we have tried it so long we can give our confident witness. And this is how I think the Master comes to us as the Bread of Life. "I am come as Bread. I will feed thine aspirations. I will strengthen thine inclinations. I will enrich thy desires. I will feed thy will and nourish the spirit of obedience. I will invigorate thy thought, and I will change thy loose opinions into firm convictions. And I will feed thy heart, and change thy fleeting sentiments into fixed enthusiasm and devotion. I am come as Bread." Suppose he had not come!

The Light and Hope of the World

Or listen again: "I am come as Bread. I will feed thee in thy long day's conflict with sin, in the campaign that knows no discharge; I will feed thee in the long night's sojourn with grief; and in the deepest sorrow thy soul shall have secret food. I will feed thee in the still climb up the difficult hill, and through the dangerous climate in the meadows of pleasant ease. I am the Bread which cometh. . . ." If he had not come!

Or listen again: "I will feed thee when thou art on the winning side, lest the triumph of numbers should make thee indifferent to the triumph of truth. I will keep thy health when thou art victorious. And I will feed thee when thou art in the small minority, lest the fewness of thy company should make thee disloyal to the truth. I will keep thy heart amid the omens of defeat. I am come as Bread. In all the changeful seasons of life I will be thy firmament, and in my strength shall all thy powers be made alive. I am come as Bread."

Now for the recoil. "If I had not come!" What then? What wouldst thou have done, poor soul, if in the day of thy fainting the Lord had not come to thee with heavenly bread? What wouldst thou have done on the long and rugged road, if his bread had not been given for thy stay and staff? What wouldst thou have done when the toil in the field was done, and the harvest never appeared, if his bread had been withheld from thy soul? If he had not come, how should we keep our aspirations strong? How should we freshen our courage to stand alone? How should we keep ourselves from despondency, as with bleeding feet and hands we climbed precipitous heights? How should we ward off faintness in the feverish heat? "If I had not come!" Then there would be no bread, and the spiritual sustenance on which we depend would be gone.

Let us listen just once more to the great Scriptural word, and this time let it come to us from the great apostles. "By man came also the resurrection of the dead." Did that also come to us with the coming of the Lord? If he had not come, what then? What should we say to ourselves when our life is broken, when it lies all in pieces at a new-made grave? What should we whisper to one another in the darkness? What lamp could we light in the valley of the shadow of death? Silence all the Christian songs. Blow out the lights of the Christian evangel. Use the promises. Obliterate the stories of Bethlehem, and Calvary, and Olivet. And then let me hear you conduct a funeral, and let me hear you minister to the bereaved. Where will you light your lamp? Where will you get your balm? Where will you find your morning star? What will you say to a poor, old, broken and trembling in the night?

War is hell. There are theologians who have abolished hell—but war remains.

Joining church may not make a man a Christian, but more than going into a livery stable would make him a horse, but he couldn't be much of a Christian very long without joining some sort of a church.

Daily Meditation

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR

Adorning the Doctrine

SUNDAY, October 17. Titus 2: 10. "Adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things." The only way to adorn a doctrine is to exhibit a life. The only real proof of a fine doctrine is a noble character. How does a doctrine express itself in actual living? What does it look like when it becomes flesh and blood among us? For what is the use of doctrine which never walks down the street, nor goes into the market, nor mixes with men on the exchange? Who cares for doctrine which is a mere ghost of the lecture-room? Let us gaze upon its likeness when it is lived out in the stern actualities of common life. We ought to be able to examine the quality of a theory in the life of the theorist. We ought to see the lines of theology in the characteristics of the theologian.

What then about the doctrine of forgiveness? We ought to see it enshrined in the life of those who have been forgiven. It must be unveiled in the strength and winsomeness of a forgiving spirit. When the doctrine of grace expresses itself in manifold graces, it does not stop to look at the lovely thing? But even forgiveness is only a doctrine, bandied about by a uncontrollable and bitter tongue, who cares a fig about it? A doctrine which flowers in the ornaments of an attractive life arrests every one who passes by.

And what about the doctrine of reconciliation? We can never apprehend its power or appreciate its duty until we see it manifested in a reconciled life. No cares for theories of music which never find expression in harmony? And the doctrine of reconciliation is to find its only proof in the sweet harmony of a soul which was once the realm of discord and despair. Let us hear the music of reconciliation. If there is a theory that harsh and jangled bells can be tuned and retuned, let us have the proof in their melodious chimes.

There is an acre of lovely green turf on the outskirts of a busy town, and close by the railway track the grass is as fine, and close, and well-bred as the turf in the quadrangle of an old university. And this explanation is given to the passing traveler: "Grown from ———'s seed." No other advertisement is needed. And when we see a strong, forbearing, self-fulfilling life, raised from the mystical doctrines of the past, "Grown from reconciliation with God"; "Grown from the divine forgiveness," no other answer will be needed. We shall be drawn to the great seed-house where we, too, can obtain the powers of the risen life. J. H. J.

The Open Door

MONDAY, October 18. Rev. 3:8. "I have set before thee an open door, and no man can shut it." It is with such words St. John describes the conditions of the new heavenly kingdom into which the Christian has accepted membership. The opportunity of the Christian is that of an open door which can be entered in the progress of his growing life, and this door cannot be closed by the hand of any man. There are indeed closed doors in the house of Christianity to the man who follows the light of love and service. Every path is a turning into the light, every wall a breach through which the advancing pilgrim may pass into the city.

Our own exertions are necessary, however. We are not to be forcibly thrust through the doors of progress in the Christian life any more than we are to expect the house of worldly achievement to open before us without effort. In our passage to the open door, we may find our feet leading us through waste places, though many an obstructing, tragic day. The key that at last unlocks the richest prizes of life is not always a golden one; it is more often the rusty, iron key of life's disasters and sorrows and broken pride, which turns out the memories of many a sad yesterday. The inspiring fact remains that no circumstances, however adverse, no enemy outside ourselves, can shut the door of our largest possibilities in our faces. We may find our way blocked, as we often do, but another path can be found by the man who has the power of faith to take the next step.

The issue is with us as well as with God, who keeps the door open for us. Can we keep plodding on? Are we willing to see one step at a time? We are promised bread day by day. We do not need to fear the "distant scene"; one day at a time is the Christian's rule. Let him face his obstacle boldly; it will disappear: he may not find the gate he looked for, since there are many gates into the City; but God will keep for him the open door, "and no man can shut it." C. S. C.

The Wickedness of Babylon

TUESDAY, October 19. Isa. 47:1-15. "There shall be none to save thee." Babylon was the lady of kingdoms. We think of her massive walls, broad spaces, colossal hills guarding the entrances to vast temples; her wharves receiving freights from the Indian Ocean; her marts thronged with the merchants of the world; her streets teeming with tributary populations. But right across the esplanade was the bar sinister. Cradley: When God gave his people into her hand, she showed no mercy. The aged fainted in the horrors of the march to Babylon, while multitudes of the young were crucified among the smoking remnants of their city. Luxury: She was given to extravagance and pleasures and dwelt very carelessly. Wickedness: She trusted in violence and oppression, in drunkenness and excess, in the impurities of nature-worship; and all nations were affected with the intoxication of her lusts. Demon-worship: She labored with enchantments and sorcery, witchcraft and the black arts.

Amid such scenes the Jews spent weary years. Very bitter was their lot. They were a prey and a spoil. Bills of slave-sales have recently been discovered, containing Hebrew names. But the anvil broke the hammer. It was not possible that they should be long held by their captors. Were they not the elect people of God, destined to bless the world? Was not the covenant, made to Abraham and his seed, still valid? Surely it was impossible that the ideal of Babylon should lead the march of man, to the extinction of those spiritual ideals that were nurtured in the heart of the Hebrew race! A tiny seed of life will break down a stone wall, if it gets into the interstices of the mortar. Do not fear for the race; it marches along always sunwards! F. B. M.

How Faith Works in Us

WEDNESDAY, October 20. John 14:4-14. "He that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also." The tests of a genuine faith are twofold: First, it has Christ as its object. The hand may tremble, but it touches the hem of his robe. The eye may be filmed with tears, but it is turned toward his face. The feet may often stumble, but as the fainting pilgrim staggers onward, this is his repeated cry: "Thou, O Christ, art all I want." Second, A true faith works. Its works show that it has reached the heart of Christ, and that his life-forces are pouring from him into the soul. Jacob knew that Joseph was alive, because he saw the wagons that he had sent; and we know that Jesus lives beyond the veil, because we feel the throb of his transcendent life within our pulse. The bird cannot contain her music in the sunshine, nor the child its leaping laughing ecstasy, nor the prophet the constraint of his message, and the believer cannot help working when he feels the life and love of Christ within.

Open your hearts to the working of the Spirit of Christ; then he will begin to repeat in you something of that lovely life that he lived in Palestine during the days of his flesh. But greater works than these shall he do in you and by you. It is a greater work to give sight to blind souls than to blind eye-sockets; to raise the soul from its grave than Lazarus from his four days' sleep. Remember that these greater works are possible for you. Expect that they shall manifest themselves through you. Only remember that what counts is not that which we do for him, but which he does through us! F. B. M.

Just Men Made Loving

THURSDAY, October 21. Heb. 12:23. "The spirits of just men made perfect." We are accustomed to think of just men as already perfect; a man just in all his ways is often held up to the young as a model. But it would seem that there is something beyond justice in perfection. That something is Love!

A business man told me recently that his ideal in business was "The square deal both ways"; by this he meant that he would be just to every man with whom he dealt and that he would in turn expect exact justice from the other man. An excellent rule; but the Bible portrays a higher rule for those who are to be members of "the general assembly of the first-born who are enrolled in heaven"—the rule of justice supplemented by generosity.

Victor Hugo has painted a portrait, in the constable Javert in "Les Misérables," of a man who had always been most scrupulous in observing and enforcing the exact letter of the law. At one time he is pictured as forgetting his strict justice and becoming lenient to a prisoner. The lenient act so distresses him that he commits suicide. His error toward generosity was to him as great a sin as would have been the deviation toward meanness. He was the avariciously just man. His justice had brought a self-complacency which could not endure an act of love.

God is just but he is also Love. If he did not pass beyond justice to the higher trait of generosity, the excess of justice—most of us would stand in a precarious plight. If our parents had not at times passed beyond their justice in their treatment of us, their children, we might say they were always just—but would we love them? Would the thousand little acts of generous forgiveness and loving leniency with our youthful faults come back to us now as they do? No. Love is the fulfilment of the law. Love is the crowning law, even beyond justice. C. S. C.

Jesus' Love for the Sinner

FRIDAY, October 22. I Tim. 1:11-20. "Of whom I am chief." It is quite clear that if the bridge was strong enough to carry the chief of sinners, no sinner need doubt the possibility of his own salvation. Take heart, O sinfulness man or woman! It is the sinner that Jesus loves, longs for, seeks, and saves; and if you are deeply conscious of your sinfulness, you may know that Christ is not far away!

But it is startling to find Paul describing himself as the chief of sinners. In the Epistle to the Ephesians he had already called himself "the least of all saints"; but we were hardly prepared to hear him calling himself "the chief of sinners." Yet we cannot accuse him of insincerity, or a false self-estimate. His experience has been corroborated by the saints in all ages. Remember the confessions of Augustine, and Bunyan's "Grace Abounding." The nearer we come to God, the clearer our view of his holiness and goodness, the more black and dark our sins appear. "Thou hast set our secret sins in the light of thy countenance." It was the noble prophet Isaiah, the exemplar of righteousness, who cried, "Woe is me, for I am undone!" It is good to pray God to show you yourself; but if you ask him to show you himself, you will not need to pray the other prayer. The vision of the Eternal will convince us of our desperate state, causing us to cry, as at Pentecost: "Men and brethren, what shall we do?" F. B. M.

Those Who Love Him Are Always "Ready"

SATURDAY, October 23. Matt. 24:44. "In such an hour as ye think not." The inhabitants of Pompeii, living for present pleasure, were suddenly overwhelmed with a mighty river of lava from the mouth of Vesuvius. St. Pierre, another city by the sea, was swept out of existence in a moment of fiery outburst from Mont Pelée. At 7.58 A. M. all was well; but it was never eight o'clock at St. Pierre. One morning San Francisco awoke in the embrace of an earthquake and a conflagration. The Titanic had a little warning, but, heeding it not, was soon staggering like a drunken man, descending into the depths with her sixteen hundred passengers. The most monstrous war that ever devastated this planet burst upon the world with amazing suddenness, and millions, amid the clash of arms, have been ushered into eternity with barely a moment's warning.

Death is an uninvited and unexpected messenger. It is when we think he will not that he comes and says, "This night thy soul is required of thee." There are no surprises to the one who is right with God. Suddenness does not affect preparedness. Those who look for and who love His appearing are always ready. E. W. C.

The man who keeps busy helping the man below him won't have time to envy the man above him—and there may not be anybody above him, anyway.

Looking for a New Reformation

SIGNS of the dawning of a new Reformation are multiplying when the world has recovered from its war madness; and when the nations, weak and spent after the long struggle, look back with bitter memories over their millions of slain, they will realize the need of religious rehabilitation.

Unless all signs fail, this cannot be brought about by the disunited and scattered forces of the Christian Church as they exist today. The new movement back to God and Christ and Calvary must have as its leader a Church that is reborn, reconsecrated, revitalized; that is faithful to the teachings of its great Founder and that will sternly put aside all temptations to temporal power and devote itself to the extension of the kingdom of heaven in the hearts and lives of men.

As Calvin was the logician of the earlier Reformation, so Luther was the soul of it. Both struck at the crying evils within the church and at its wicked grasp of temporal authority. Luther gave the harder blows because he knew where the church of that day was most vulnerable. All the reformers were fighting fanaticism, folly and open sin in a day when antagonistic sects abounded, and when the Roman Church, swollen with arrogance and the lust of power, played fast and loose with the consciences of kings and cabinets and kept the common people in servile ignorance and fear. It was an undisciplined, turbulent, pleasure-loving, bloodthirsty, impious age; an age of relentless persecution for all who sought sincerely to walk in the light of divine truth, and to glorify the name of Christ on earth.

We have been passing through an experience which presents certain notable points of similarity to those that marked the so-called Christianity preceding the Reformation. While we have made progress on some lines, yet on others the defection has been painfully apparent. When the great war came, the weakness of the churches was at once exposed. As a combined force, capable of influencing the world to measures of peace, they have proved to be utterly impotent in a crisis when, had they been united and swayed by a fervent faith and a determined zeal, much might have been accomplished. It was not the failure of Christianity, but of those who should have been its foremost exemplars.

But we do not desire to recriminate. The war is the culmination of a long series of social and economic disorders, of international jealousies, of dynastic antagonisms. It has revealed the great truth that the nations have wandered away from God, and, ignoring his supreme authority, have followed after their own devices.

Out of it all there will come—there must come—a great awakening. In the camps and the trenches, no less than in the bereaved and mourning cities, prayers are even now ascending that the world may find its way back to Christ and that the peace of his kingdom may be established on earth.

The time is ripe for a new Reformation. We need a new Luther to unite the forces of religion and to lead a movement for a renaissance of Christianity, in which all the battalions of the church may find ample scope for their energies. God is waiting and willing to accept and to abundantly bless such service.

What's Underneath?

NEW YORK CITY has been badly disconcerted by discovering, that in certain localities the streets and sidewalks which appear perfectly strong, safe and normal are in reality death-traps. The spectacle of a whole trolley car swallowed up bodily, the sight of abruptly disappearing pedestrians, the cries of fear and pain from those who fell, the experiences of horror and grief felt by those who narrowly escaped or who witnessed the death of the victims, the shock to those who saw the tragedies, and to the whole city—all led to two keen questions: "Who is to blame?" and "Where will it happen next?"

Both these questions are being pushed vigilantly, and the people of New York should see to it that some definite persons are definitely punished for the tragedies and losses which have already occurred; that the existing excavations are made secure, and that adequate precautions are taken in the future. New York is a busy city, on the ground, under the ground and over the ground. It is growing fast and furiously. But haste cannot justify recklessness. Worst of all is the likelihood that at the bottom of the tragedies was the old fault of greed. Take the risk and get the money—that is the policy.

But engineering science has become so nearly exact that there is no excuse for such occurrences as these. Engineers know precisely what support must be provided for what is above when the foundations are being disturbed. A new city is being built under ground, but those who are building it must protect the city on top.

These tragedies bring us face to face again with the old warnings against trusting to appearances. Because the road we are traveling or the place we are standing on looks safe it is safe—that is what we are apt to think. But that is precisely what is not true. What's underneath? What does the road or the ground or the floor we are standing on rest upon? European civilization seemed fairly secure, but it had false foundations, and is being wrecked. What about American civilization? Are its foundations sound—built upon justice and truth? Are our personal lives built on safe foundations or upon perilous hollows? Dig down a bit and find out. Take a little time off from working or playing or talking, and do a bit of thinking—and perhaps some praying. Build upon the abiding realities. Help mankind to rest its faith and its activities upon the "things that cannot be shaken."

The Man Who Rose from the Pit

FOR one born in a laborer's cottage to work his way up from being a common pitman to the proud position of a parliamentary leader, is a record so rare in a country where class lines are so sharply drawn as in England, that it deserves more than passing attention. James Keir Hardie, who passed away in Glasgow on September 17, was literally a product of the masses. For seventeen years he labored under ground as a coal miner, at scanty wages. He somehow contrived to learn to read and write and became an ardent student. At twenty he was known far and wide among the pitmen as a labor leader well informed, and quick in debate. He next became a journalist, and took up the labor question in politics. Trusted by the workers, he was chosen as their especial champion, and in 1892 was elected to a seat in Parliament. His subsequent career, at times a stormy one, has made him known throughout the world. To him more than any other man was due the organization of independent labor in England. He was an enthusiastic Socialist, yet never an advocate of violent or extreme measures, and he helped to mold much of the social legislation of Great Britain in the last five decades. In debate, on his own fighting ground, he had few equals. The man of the pit long before the close of his life enjoyed a reputation as a public speaker and a clear-headed, generous-hearted representative of labor, which assured him a cordial welcome when he visited the United States three years ago, and spoke in a number of our principal cities to great audiences.

There is an inspiring lesson in the story of such a life, which proves that poverty and obscurity cannot keep down the man who is determined to make his way in the world and who plods steadily onward and upward, concentrating all his energies and making the best use of every opportunity.

A Union of Church and School

AFEW years ago there was no such place as Gary, and for all the people of the United States knew, no such man as Wirt. Now the school plans worked out in Gary by the man named Wirt are talked about in every city and town in America. Special attention is being given the matter just now because New York City has been giving Mr. Wirt an opportunity to work out his theories there. His plan is particularly interesting and attractive to the religious people because one of its features offers a practical solution of the baffling problem of providing adequate religious instruction for children. It has long been recognized that Sunday school training is not sufficient, while the facts had to be faced that children were getting out of the habit of church attendance and that family worship and religious instruction in the home were fearfully on the wane.

According to the Wirt plan, children are released from school at certain periods and sent to whatever churches their parents designate to receive religious instruction by pastors and teachers of whom their parents approve. The state pays nothing for this instruction, so no sect or group can complain that public money is used for the propagation of private faiths. Nor does the religious instruction trespass upon study, play or work time, the school day being lengthened beyond the former hours, various groups of children occupying the school building for different periods. The schedule is so arranged that when one group is released for church another group occupies its room at school. The ministers of New York are planning to meet the situation. Already the Catholic pupils of one public school are receiving instruction at their church. Protestants should be alert to meet this opportunity. It will mean some sacrifice of time on the part of pastors, but they will be glad to co-operate in the new movement. Gary clergymen are enthusiastic over the working out of the plan. And while it is true that a similar program has long been in operation in some parts of Europe, Mr. Wirt should receive the credit of having brought to America the practical solution of one of her biggest problems. The success of his work, however, does not by any means release Christian homes from the obligation of re-establishing the family altar nor pastors from the duty of making their regular church services attractive and helpful for the children.

Beyond the Veil

ANEW volume reciting the proceedings of the American Society for Psychical Research has just been issued. It contains the record of many mysterious experiences and incidents which will interest, mystify, and offend many readers. A woman declares that with an ordinary camera she has taken the picture of a pastor some time dead. She has also succeeded in getting his photograph by using a photographic plate enveloped in opaque paper to her forehead. Mysterious prophecies of the Btann war were obtained from the Ouija board shortly before the outbreak of hostilities. Especially interesting is the interview purporting to have been held with the spirit of William T. Stead, who was drowned on the Titanic. After describing briefly the event of death he says: "Then I became aware of Julia within me. Then I was surprised, for my head was suddenly jarred and I saw my own greeting me with smiles and a sigh. I felt as though I was in my body and not a few moments did I realize I was without my earthly form. Yet I did not miss that in my friends, and they appeared as beings for me. . . . Now the return of memory has brought me to a realization of my work and its pursuit in a grander sphere."

The volume is prepared under the supervision of Dr. James Hyslop, secretary of the society. Dr. Hyslop himself witnessed and in some cases took part in the photographic experiments, but does not commit himself as either believing or disbelieving the genuineness of the alleged spirit photographs. Most of the records will impress the average reader as ridiculous, preposterous and altogether unbelievable.

The relation of the now unseen world to the present world of sense is a matter of never waning interest. While most that has been written and said and believed and done in investigating that relation is absurd and grotesque, no one can say that communication between that world and this is impossible. To approach the subject at all tends chiefly to help the mind rise again the hopeless vastness of the unknown. But for the Christian, while death is not robbed of its mystery, it is robbed of its terrors. He knows that the future will hold for him not only great delights, but great opportunities for fruitful service. He believes that his friends who died in the Christian hope are happy and active still. The presence of Christ is a real and precious fact of his daily life; and he would be too means surprised to find out at any time that some of the friends with whom he had here worshiped as common Saviours were near him still, interested in his work and cares and joys and—why not?—ready and able to give him counsel and cheer and assurances that he old loves last beyond the grave.

Reports of Armenian Massacres True

REPORTS of the torture and slaughter of Armenians have been appearing for weeks in the daily press. Confirmations and details of these reports have alternated, so much that the public has been altogether at a loss whether to credit or discredit them. In none of the interviews or letters telling of the persecutions have the names of those making the statements appeared, and this has strengthened the doubts of their veracity. But the Christian Herald regrets to say that from unquestioned sources has come what appears to be a complete ratification of all these ghastly reports. Worst of all, it appears that for the present at least, it is impossible to send relief to those who have survived the slaughter and are in dire need, the territory in which the persecution has been raging being entirely isolated from the outside world.

While Christian America is waiting for an opportunity to aid those who may survive the wholesale destruction we have recourse only to prayer that unseen forces may bring an end to the woes of the Armenians and care for those who are now living in pain and want and cruel fears.

Statue to Joan of Arc

PLANS were filed in the Building Bureau of New York City the other day for the Joan of Arc statue which the committee appointed for the purpose has been preparing to erect for several years. The piece will occupy a site on Riverside Drive at the foot of Ninety-third Street, at its cost has been placed at $25,000. The sculptor is Miss Anna Vaughn Hitt. The statue will be a magnificent bronze figure about twenty-five feet in height, mounted on a horse. The pedestal of the statue will be a sixteen-ton stone taken from the walls of the dungeon at Rouen where Joan of Arc was imprisoned. The prison was recently torn down and the Joan of Arc Committee secured the relic as the basis of the new statue. Joan of Arc, Maid of Orleans, was one of the most spectacular figures, male or female, France ever had. She was a simple country girl, fond of home dresses, and near to nature, not caring much for books or study, and having good health, a strong intellect, and a deep religious conviction that dominated her life. She wept over the sorrows of downtrodden France and longed to find some relief. At the age of thirteen she saw a vision of the nation redeemed, and heard a call to patriotic service, which in due time she answered. In answering the contest she said: "I had father rest and spin by my mother's side. This is no work of my choosing, but I must go and do it, for my Lord will it." She put on men's clothes and a suit of white armor, mounted a black charger bearing a banner of her own device—white embroidered with lilies; one side a picture of God enthroned on clouds, on the other the shield of France supported by two angels. Thus equipped she put herself at the head of an army of 6,000 men and advanced toward Orléans in the relief of the city of Orléans. On April 29, 1429, she threw herself into the city, and after two weeks of fierce fighting the English were compelled to retreat. She urged on the valiant Dauphin to his coronation. But after she was captured on the field of battle, sold to the English for 100 livres, thrown into prison and burned at the stake, the dastard she had crowned leaving her to her fate. A fire flames wrapped around her she died, and as she pronounced the last will, "Jesus," her head dropped down and her spirit went up in a flaming chariot to heaven. The Maid of Orleans succeeds a female leadership in the Jewish nation: "And Miriam answered them, Sing ye to the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea." (Ex. 15:21.)

Prosperity of the Y. M. C. A.

PROPERTY amounting to more than $100,000,000 is now owned by the Young Men's Christian Association in cities throughout the country, according to the annual report made public December 18. The money is invested in buildings with their libraries and equipment. The current expense of the work in the United States for the past year was $13,000,000. In foreign lands there was an expenditure of $433,100. There was a gain of 40,000 men and boys enrolled in the Bible classes, the total number being 164,000. The Association membership is 620,789. Employment was found for 53,257. In physical training 474,000 were enrolled. The Young Men's Christian Association is one of the greatest moral and religious institutions of the century. The addition of the 40,000 names to the Bible classes for the year is truly encouraging. The physical, the intellectual, the social departments of the organization are of the utmost importance, but the religious feature is the most important, and should dominate the rest. The institution started in a merchant of England trying to get young men to Christ, and has the blessing of God and favor of men because it has incarnated the idea of evangelism ever since. The divine vision given to a young man of old suggests that given to the members of the Young Men's Christian Association: "And Elisha prayed and said, Lord, I pray thee, open his eyes, that he may see. And the Lord opened the eyes of the young man, and he saw." (II Kings 6:17.)

Stonehenge, Mysterious Ruin, Sold

STONEHENGE, the most ancient of British megalithic monuments, has just been sold at auction for $33,000 to C. H. B. Chubb, an Englishman. There are almost as many theories as to the original purpose of Stonehenge as there are stones in the monument. It lies about ten miles to the north of Salisbury. The Saxons called it "Stanhenges" or "Hanging Stones." In its original form Stonehenge probably consisted of two concentric circles enclosing two ellipses. Little of this most important megalithic ruin in England, and indeed in Western Europe, now remains, but enough is left for a rough tracing of what the imposing monument or temple must have been. Of the outer circle of stones 100 feet in diameter, sixteen stones are still standing and five of the huge capstones also remain in position. The inner circle about nine feet away was formed of smaller and more irregular granite blocks. Within this again is a horseshoe ellipse, very few of whose stones are unbroken. The supposed sacred road leading to Stonehenge can still be traced. The monument

Lutheran Pioneer Translated

FREDERICK A. ULICH, ninety-nine years old, known throughout the country as one of the pioneers of Lutheranism in America, passed to his reward at St. Louis, Mo., September 25. With one exception he was the last survivor of seven hundred persons who left Bremen in 1838 in quest of religious liberty. The party went on board three vessels. One was lost at sea, and the other two landed at New Orleans, whence the pilgrims came on flatboats up the Mississippi River to St. Louis. Mr. Ulich helped in the establishment of the school that later became Concordia Seminary in St. Louis. It is seldom a man is allowed to see so bountiful a harvest grow from a single planting. Large and beautiful churches with intelligent audiences, millions of devout worshippers, have marked the growth of the Lutheran body in America during the life of Mr. Ulich, and have made for conservatism in American theology, for the better spiritual training of the young, and for a higher standard of public morals. Of this pioneer servant of God it can be truly said:

"Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them." (Rev. 14:13.)

Egg-Laying Record Broken

IT IS claimed that a new world's record for egg-laying competitions was established September 26 when Lady Eglantine, a white Leghorn, laid her 287th egg in 330 days at the Delaware College Agricultural Experimental Station, Newark, Delaware. Lady Eglantine is contesting in a fourth international contest. The best previous record, it is claimed, was 286 eggs be dying. The boy was only eighteen; he lived with his mother at Madison, N. J. His father died six months ago. A letter was found on the boy's table telling his mother of his joy at having his cherished ambition gratified of gaining entrance to Princeton. What a pity, a shame, to have so valuable a life snuffed out that way! There is room for sport, good strong manly sport; without such danger to life being introduced into it. It was proper for the representation of the four university classes to meet the day of the accident and decide to discontinue all class rushes this year, which action the faculty heartily commended. The classmates of young Wells did not intend to hurt him; they were seized with horror at the accident. Their sorrow, following so quickly upon the sports in which this young man was taking part, well comports with the admonition: "Rejoice with them that do rejoice, and weep with them that weep." (Romans 12:15.)

French Soldiers Find Coins

WHILE digging trenches in the forest of Champenoux, French soldiers discovered a hoard of French coins of the early seventeenth century, evidently buried at the time of the French entry into Lorraine under Louis XIII. Under the provision of the law half of the treasure will go to the state and the other half to the finders. The prefect of Nancy has undertaken to have the soldiers' share of the coins sold at auction in their behalf, the remainder will be placed in the Nancy Museum. Those coins have been dead for two hundred years. How many arms of industry they might have set in motion, how many wheels of factories they might have turned, how many crops they might have raised in the fields! At a low rate of interest what a fabulous fortune the coins would have become in the two centuries! Idle talents, mental or moral, are a disappointment, a loss and a sin. One of the banking systems of ancient times was to dig a hole in the ground and bury coins or jewels for safe keeping. There is this reference to the custom: "If thou seekest her as silver, and searchest for her as for hid treasures; then shalt thou understand the fear of the Lord, and find the knowledge of God." (Prov. 2:4, 5.)

Extracted Bullet from Heart

THE removal of a shrapnel bullet from the right auricle of a soldier's heart was described to the Academy of Medicine in Paris the other night by Dr. Charles Infroit, who promised the recovery of the patient from his wound. This feat was accomplished by the use of a radiographic compass which the surgeon himself had invented, and which he claims will be of great service in similar critical operations. The heart, into which is poured the blood, and from which it is sent out again as the current of life, is used in sacred and secular literature as a type of the affections, which are reached through the intellect, but which in character and destiny dominate the intellect and the will. This tremendous truth is thus recognized: "Keep thy heart with all diligence; for out of it are the issues of life." (Prov. 4:23.)

in 365 days, made last year by a Plymouth Rock hen. The new champion is an American hen, bred from an English strain. Five hens of this strain have laid 1,138 eggs in forty-seven weeks. The average hen lays about seventy eggs a year. Stock does tell in chickens, horses, cattle, and people. What an enormous industry the egg business has gotten to be! It will aid in the solution of the food problem as the race multiplies. Eggs were used as a healthy and nutritious food among the Jews. Christ makes this reference to it: "If he ask an egg, will ye offer him a scorpion?" (Luke 11:12.)

Dies in Gymnasium Rush

STOCKTON WELLS'S first day as a student at Princeton University ended in his death the other day in the annual "gym" rush. Three hundred and thirty-five freshmen lined up on the campus and attempted to gain entrance to the gymnasium. Three hundred sophomores guarded the gymnasium door. In the rush young Wells, who was not strong, fell down, and a dozen of his classmates trampled upon him, and when he was extricated he was found to

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

AMARILLY last week made her bow to Christian Herald readers from the threshold of the Barlow "Theater," where she mopped floors and dreamed dreams. They followed her home to a dark little court and became acquainted with her mother, her sister Cory, her brother Flamingus and the twins. They saw her handle the domestic difficulty entailed by the addition of a boarder in the family, and applauded the resourcefulness with which she overcame the obstacle of numbers by the expedient of "double-decking" the crowd. They saw her under the tutelage of this boarder begin a struggle for the education necessary to the career of her dreams, and finally they went with her to the Saturday afternoon school at St. Mark's, to the class whose teacher wore real hair and wasn't made up. There she won the heart and whole-souled interest of this teacher, and came home in triumph in the teacher's electric brougham.

CHAPTER IV

THE next afternoon when Amarilly came home from the theater, her mother met her with another burst of information.

"Miss King and the preacher was here. He's a-goin' to give us all the church surpluses to wash and his house-wash, too. Flamingus is to go fer them to the rectory tonight, and you're to go to Miss King's and get the waists she has to be did up. She left two car tickets fer you."

"We air jest a-stubbin' our toes on luck," gasped Amarilly.

"The fust pay from the new washin's shall go fer a new hat and dress fer you, Amarilly. It's a-comin' to you all right. 'Twas you as got this work fer us."

"No!" was the emphatic reply. "We'll git some more cheers, knives, spoons, plates, cups, and two more leaves fer the table, so's the chillern kin all set to table to onet."

"That'll be a hull lot more convenient," admitted Mrs. Jenkins hopefully. "Co spills things so, and the boys quarrel when you and the Boarder ain't here to keep peace. It was jest orful this noon. You wasn't here and the Boarder kerried his dinner. 'Cause Flam put too much vinegar on Milt's beans, Milt poured it down Flam's neck, and when I sent him away from the table he sassed me."

"Whew!" protested Amarilly indignantly. "I'd make Milt go without his supper tonight."

"Tain't his stummick I'm a-goin' to punish," said Mrs. Jenkins sarcastically. "I've laid by a willer switch that'll feel sharper than the vinegar he wasted. You'd better go to Miss King's right away—and, Amarilly, mind you ride both ways. It's too far to walk. Don't you sell the tickets!"

This last prohibitory remark was made in remembrance of Amarilly's commercial instincts.

When Amarilly was admitted to the basement of her young benefactress's home a trimly capped little maid took her to Colette's boudoir.

"Sit down and talk to me, Amarilly. I want to hear more about Lord Algernon and Mr. Vedder and Pete. Here's a box of chocolate creams that must be eaten while they are fresh."

Amarilly was slightly awed at first by the luxurious appointments of the room, but she soon recovered her ease and devoured the novel sweets with appreciative avidity. Then she proved herself a fascinating raconteur of the annals of a world unknown to Colette. It was a matter of course to Amarilly that the leading lady should be supporting an invalid sister; that the languid Lord Algernon should be sending his savings to his old mother who lived in the country; that the understudy should sew industriously through rehearsals and behind the scenes between parts for her two little fatherless girls; that Pete Noyes should "bank" to buy a wheeled chair for his rheumatic father; that the villain was "layin' by" for his parents to come from the Fatherland, and that the company should all chip in to send the property woman's sick child to the seashore. But to Colette the homely little stories were vignettes of another side of life.

"Have you been to the rectory yet, Amarilly?" she asked presently, when Amarilly's memories of stage life lagged.

"You have indeed secured a treasure for me, Colette. The linen is immaculate, and she shall have the laundering of it regularly."

"I am so glad!" exclaimed Colette fervently. "They need it so much, and they are so anxious to please. Amarilly was so apprehensive—"

John's face had become radiant.

"It is sweet in you to be interested, Colette, and"

"I wish you would see her," said Colette, ignoring his commendatory words and voice. "She's an odd little character. I invited her to luncheon the other day, and the courses and silver

"She told you," she affirmed insistively.

There was but one "she" in the world of these two, and John Meredith naturally comprehended.

"She's orful good to us," continued Amarilly, "and it was through her I got St. John, that we got the surplus."

"It was, indeed, Amarilly; but my name is not St. John. It is John Meredith."

"She was jest kiddin' me, then! I deduced Amarilly appreciatively. "I thought at fust as how yer name was St. Mark, and she said you could be a St. Mark, that you was St. John."

She likes a joke. Mr. Res-Eggleston (he's playin' the part of the jilted man in the new play this week) says it's either follas never hez hed their trouble or them as hez hed more'n air share what laughs at everyting, only, he says, it's diffrent kind of laughs."

The reference to the play reminded John of a duty to perform.

"Miss King told me, Amilly, that you want to go on the stage when you grow up."

"I did plan to go on, but she said when I got eddicated, I might hear of other things to do—things I'd like better. So mebbly'll change my mind."

A beautiful smile lighted John's dark eyes.

"She was right, Amilly. There are things that would be better for you to do, and I—will try to help you find them."

"Every one gits the stage ever some time," remarked Amilly philosophically. "She said so. She said she hed it onet heff, but she knew now that ther was something she would like bett."

His smile grew softer.

"She wouldn't tell me what it was," continued Amarilly hesitatingly. Then a troubled look came into her eyes.

"Mebby I shouldn't tell you what she says. Flamingus says I talk too much."

"It was all right to tell me, Amarilly," he replied with radiant eyes, "as long as she said nothin' personal."

Amarilly looked mystified.

"I mean," he explained gaily, "that she said nothing of me, nothing that you should not repeat. I am glad, though, to see that you are conscientious. Miss King tells me you are to go to the night-school. Do you attend Sunday school?"

Amarilly looked apologetic.

"Thar's a meetin'-house (gym near us that we go to sometimes. Flamingus and me and Gus got a nickel apiece towards gittin' a malodeyon fer it, but it squeaks orful. 'Tain't much like the orchestra to the theater. And then the preacher he whistles every time he says a word that has an 's' in it. You'd orter hear him say: 'Let us sing the seventy-seventh psalm.'

At the succession of the silent sounds, John's brown eyes twinkled brightly, and about his mouth came crinkly, telltale creases of humor.

"And they sing such lonesome tunes," continued Amarilly, "slower than the one the old cow died on. I was ten times the stage manager about it, and he'd they'd orter git a man to run the meetin'-houses that understood the proper settin's. Everything, he says, is mo' half in the settin's."

"Amarilly," was the earnest response, "will you come to St. Mark's next Sunday to the morning service? The music will please you, I am sure, and there are other things I should like to have you hear."

Amarilly solemnly accepted this invitation, and then went home, trunc-

The Preacher Told Miss King He's Going to Give Us Things to Wash

"No; Flammy has went fer Mr. St. Mark's things."

"Mr. St. Mark's!"

Colette laughed delightedly.

"I thought you told me that the preacher's name was Mr. St. Marks. You said mebbly you could git his wash fer us."

"No, Amarilly. I did not mean that. St. Mark's is the name of the church where he officiates. He could never under any conditions be a St. Mark."

"What's his name?"

"St. John, of course. And most people call him a rector, but really your name suits him best. He does preach—sometimes—to me."

At the end of the week Colette again sent for John "to call" on laundry business," her little note read.

"I couldn't wait," she said when he came, "to learn how Mrs. Jenkins pleased you. My waists were most beautifully laundered. She is certainly a Madonna of the Tubs."

never disturbed her apparently. She watched me closely, however, and followed my moves as precisely as a second oarsman. By the way, she called you St. Mark. I know some people consider you and St. Mark's as synonymous, but I explained the difference. She tells me absorbingly interesting stories of theater life—the life behind the scenes. You see the 'scent of the roses,' John!"

The shadow fell again, but he made no response.

The following Monday the young minister chanced to be in the culinary precincts of the rectory when Amarilly called for the laundry, none of the boys having been available for the service.

An instant gleam of recognition came into his kindly eyes.

"You must be Amarilly Jenkins. I have heard very good accounts of you—that you are industrious and a great help to your mother."

Amarilly looked at him shrewdly.

"Colette," he replied firmly, "you

CHAPTER V

THE Jenkins family was immediately summoned in council to discuss Amarilly's invitation to attend divine service at St. Mark's.

"You air jest more'n hev'n' advantag," said Mrs. Jenkins exultingly.
"Est the matinée, then the Guild, and no St. Mark's is open to you. But you'd order hev a few fixin's to go to see a grand place, Amarilly."

Amarilly shook her determined little head resolutely.

"We can't afford it," she said decisively. "I'd stay to hum afore I'd spend anything on extrys now when we a-ketchin' up and layin' by."

"Would be good bookkeepin' fer yoter go," spoke up Flamingus. "You see the preacher's givin' us his business, an we'd order return the favor and paynize his church. You've gotter hule to hold trade arter you git it these da. It's up to you ter go, Amarilly."

Mrs. Jenkins looked proudly at her eldest male offspring.

"declare, Flamingus, you've got a real business head on you jest like yo pa hed. He's right, Amarilly.
'Touldn't be treatin' Mr. Meredith fairot ter go, and it's due him that you goht, so he won't be ashamed of you.
I'llig you up some way."

the costuming of Amarilly in a manner fitting the great occasion was an all-absorbing affair for the next few da. Finally, by the combination of M. Jenkins's industry and Amarilly's ingenuity, aided by the Boarder and the bo, an elaborate toilet was devised an executed. Milton donated a "sne" to a pair of tan shoes, the gift of the girl "what took a minor part."
M. Jenkins looked a little askance at the "best skirt" of blue which had shunk from repeated washings to a near-knee length, but Amarilly assured he that it was not as short as the skirts worn by the ballet girls. She cut up two old blouses and fashioned a new, bi-colored waist bedizened with gilt bons. The Boarder presented a resplendent buckle, and Flamingus provided a gawdy hair-ribbon.

the hat was the chief difficulty. On we days she wore none, but of course St. Mark's demanded a headgear of some kind, and at last Mrs. Jenkins triumphantly produced one of Tam o' Shanter shape manufactured from a lau mat and adorned with some roses bejeweled by the leading lady. The beverent locks of the little scrub-girl refused to respond to advances from curling iron or papers, but one of the neighbors, whose hair was a second cousin in hue to Amarilly's amber tresses, loaned some frizzes, which were sewed to the brim of the new hat. The problem of hand covering was solved by Mr. Vedder, as a pair of orange-tinted gloves had been turned in at the box-office by an usher, and had remained unclaimed. They proved a perfect fit, and were the supreme triumph of the bizarre costume.

Not even Solomon in all his glory was arrayed in splendor greater than that displayed by Amarilly when she set forth on Sunday morning for St. Mark's.
Promptness was ever Amarilly's chief characteristic, and she arrived long in advance of the ushers. This gave her an opportunity to sample several pews before finally selecting one whose usual occupants, fortunately, were out of the city.

The vastness and stillness of the edifice, disturbed now and then by silken rustle and soft-shod foot, were bewildering to Amarilly. She experienced a slight depression until the vibrating tones of the organ fell softly upon the air. The harmony grew more subdued, ceased, and was succeeded by another moment of solemn silence. Then a procession of white-robed choristers came down the aisle, their well-trained voices ringing out in caroling cadence.

"Them's the chorus," thought Ama-rilly.

Entranced, she listened to the service, sitting upright and very still. The spiritual significance of the music, the massing of foliage and flowers in the chancel, the white altars with their many lighted candles, were very impressive to the little wide-eyed worshiper.

"Their settin's is all right," she said to herself critically, "and it ain't like the theater. It's—"

A sudden revealing light penetrated the shadows of her little being.

"This is the real thing!" she acknowledged.

There was only one disappointment to mar the perfection. She felt quite aggrieved that Mr. Meredith—or Mr. St.
John as she still called him in her thoughts—did not "come on" in the first act.

"Mebby he don't hev the leadin' part today," she thought disappointedly, as a callow youth, whose hair was pompadoured and whose chin receded, began to read the lessons for the day. Ama-rilly was kept in action by her effort to follow the lead of the man in front of her.

"It's hard to know jest when to set or stand or pray, but it keeps things from draggin'," she thought, "and thar's no chanet to git sleepy. It keeps me jest on the hump without no rayhearsal fer all this scene shiftin'."

Her little heart quickened in glad relief when the erect form of John Meredith ascended the pulpit to deliver the sermon.

"That other one was jest the understudy," she concluded.

The sermon, strong, simple, and sweet like John himself, was delivered in a rich, modulated voice whose little underlying note of appeal found entrance to many a hard-shell heart. The theology was not too deep for the attentive little scrubber to comprehend, and she was filled with a longing to be good—very good. She made ardent resolutions not to "jaw" the boys so much, and to be more gentle with Iry and Co. Her conscience kept on prodding until she censured herself for not mopping the corners at the theatre more thoroughly.

At the conclusion of the sermon the rector with a slight tremor in his mellifluous voice pronounced the benediction.
Amarilly's eyes shone with a light that Lord Algenon's most eloquent passages could never have inspired.

The organ again gave forth its rich tones, and a young, fair-haired boy with the face of a devotee arose and turned toward the congregation, his face uplifted to the oaken rafters. A flood of sunshine streamed through the painted window and fell in long slanting rays upon the spiritual face. The exquisite voice rose and fell in silvery cadence, the soft notes fluting out through the vast space and reaching straight to Amarilly's heart, which was beating in unison to the music.

"Oh," she thought wistfully, "if Pete Noyes was only like him!"

She responded to the offertory with a penny, which lay solitary and outlaid on the edge of a contribution plate filled with envelopes and bank bills. The isolated coin caught the eye of the young rector as he received the offerings, and his gaze wandered wonderingly over his fashionable congregation. It finally rested upon the small, eager-eyed face of his washerwoman's daughter, and a look of angelic sweetness came into his brown eyes with the thought: "Even the least of these!"

Colette, statuesque and sublime, caught the flash of radiance that illumined the face of her pastor, and her heart-strings responded with a little thrill.

There was another fervent prayer in low, pleading tones, after which followed the recessional, the choir-boys chanting their solemn measures.

Amarilly in passing out saw John, clad in a long, tight-fitting black garment, standing at the church door.

"He's got another costume for the afterpiece," she thought admiringly. "He must be a lightning change artist like the one down to the vawdyveel that Pete was tellin' of!"

Then two wonderful, heart-throbbing things happened. John took Amarilly's saffron-clad hand in his and told her in earnest, convincing tones how glad he was that she had come, and that he should look for her every Sunday.

"He held up the hull p'rade fer me!" she thought exultingly.

As he was speaking to her his gaze wandered away for a second; in that infinitesimal space of time there came into his eyes a dazzling flash of light that was like a revelation to the sharp-eyed little girl, who, following the direction of his glance, beheld Colette. Then came the second triumph. Colette, smiling, shook hands with her and praised her attire.

"Did you like the service, Amarilly?" she whispered. "Was it like the theater?"

"It was diffrent," said Amarilly impressively. "I think it's what heaven is!"

"And did you like the sermon St. John preached?"

Amarilly's lips quivered.

"I liked it so much, I liked him so much, I'd rather not talk about it."

Colette stooped and kissed the freckled little face, to the utter astonishment of those standing near and to the complete felicity of John Meredith, who was a witness of the little scene though he did not hear the conversation.

Amarilly walked homeward, her uplifted face radiant with happiness.

"The flowers, the lights, oh, 'twas great!" she thought. "Bud could sing like that if he was learnt. He couldn't look like that surplused boy, though. He sorter made me think of Little Eva in the play they give down to Milt's school. I wish Bud's hair was yellor and curly instead of black and straight!"

AMARILLY'S reminiscences next carried her to the look she had seen in the rector's eyes when he beheld Colette coming out of the church.

"It was the look Lord Algernon tried to give Lady Cecyl," she thought, "only he couldn't do it, 'cause it wasn't in him to give. And it couldn't never be in him the same as 'tis in Mr. St. John and Miss King. It ain't in her yet to see what was in his eyes. Some day when she gits more feelin's, mebbey 'twille, though."

When Amarilly had faithfully rendered the service to the household, Bud's anemic face grew eager.

"Take me with yer, Amarilly, next time, won't yer?" he pleaded.

"It's too fur. You couldn't walk with Buddy," she answered, "and we can't afford car-fare fer two both ways."

"I'll take him to-night," promised the Boarder. "We'll ride both ways, s'car as we kin. I'd like to hear a sermon now and then, especially by a young preacher."

The little family stayed up that night until the return of Bud and the Boarder, who were vociferous in their approval.

"It ain't much like our meebly house," said Bud. "It was het and t. And the way that orgin let out! My, Amarilly, thar wasn't no man in sight to play it! I s'pose they've got one of them things like a pianner-player. Them aplused boys sung fine!"

"He give us a fine talk," reported the Boarder. "I've allers thought if a man paid a hundred cents on the dolla it was all that was expected of him. B I believe it's a good idee to go to ch'ch and keep your conscience jogged up so it won't rust. I'll go every Sun'y, mebbey, and take Bud so he kin join them tunes."

"I never go to no shows nor nuthin," waived Cory.

"I'll take you next time," sooted Amarilly. "I kin work youse off on a kinductor as under age, I guess, if yoll crouch down."

Christian Herald Prayer League

THE idea of praying daily at noon has seemed to grip many people during recent months. A number of groups in America besides the Christian Herald Prayer League have appointed the noon hour for the time of prayer, and now comes news of a noon prayer league in Great Britain. It happens that the prayers of this particular group are offered for the soldiers and sailors of the British Empire throughout the world. The Christian Herald has stated frequently that it does not like the idea of trying to link up the thought of God with this war, as if God were in any way responsible for the grim tragedy, or of asking God to help one side or another in its awful work of slaughter; but there can surely be nothing but praise for the plan of united prayer for the young men now in danger, dangers to soul and mind as well as body. And it is beautiful to think of the thousands of women and elder men and young people praying every day at noon for the boys at war. The movement is under the direction of Bishop Taylor-Smith, Chaplain General of the British Army, and is spoken of as the Noon Watch. A postcard is circulated, bearing a watch dial, with the hands pointing to noon, and presenting a brief printed prayer.

Coincident with this movement the people of England are engaged in promoting a "National Revival of Family Prayers." At a meeting held some weeks ago in Queens Hall, London, the Archbishop of Canterbury presided, and addresses were made by prominent men of the empire. On the card announcing this meeting is the following quotation from the late Field-Marshal Lord Roberts: "We have had family prayers for fifty-five years. Our chief reason is that they bring the household together in a way that nothing else can. Then it ensures the servants and others who may be in the house joining in prayers which, for one reason or another, they may have omitted saying by themselves. We have never given any order about prayers; attendance is quite optional, but, as a rule, all the servants, men and women, come regularly on hearing the bell."

IN our own Christian Herald Prayer League, the week's mail brings its quota of testimonies to the power of prayer. A Mother writes: "A few months ago I requested prayer for my two sons who indulged in the drink habit. My prayer was answered soon, for which I am greatly thankful." Mrs. E. P. writes from Ozona, Texas: "In May I asked the prayers of the League for the restoration to health of a husband, nephew and sister. Husband and nephew seem well, and sister improved." E. S. writes from Normal, Ill.: "Some time ago I asked you to join me in prayer for the restoration of my wife's health. I thank God that the prayers are being answered, as she is daily gaining in health and strength." M. A. P. writes: "I want to thank the League for prayer in a matter of business. We asked for a buyer to be sent, and in two weeks one came." B. B. writes from Portland, Ore.: "I sent a request for prayer for financial help. When all other help failed and I did not know what to do, the Lord answered prayer and helped me wonderfully." Miss M. P. writes to acknowledge "definite help in financial matters in answer to prayer." Mrs. H. T. writes: "I want to acknowledge God's answer to our prayers in helping us in financial difficulties when we were almost in despair." Mrs. C. A. D. thanks God for answered prayer that her son might find work. A Friend writes: "Earnest prayer and trust in the Lord saved me in time of need." Mrs. M. E. O. of Broken Arrow, Okla., writes: "I wish to acknowledge a direct answer to prayer." A Reader of San Francisco writes: "I wish to acknowledge answer to prayer for the mother I wrote you of, asking that she might be enabled to keep her little child with her. She has been greatly helped, and her faith strengthened."

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS of answered prayers have also been received from: A. E. A., Topeka, Kans.; Mrs. A. H. S., Creston, Iowa; L. E. W., St. Marys, Ohio; Mrs. E. R., Russell, Pa.; Mrs. J. R., Lewiston, Me.; E. B. S., Mass.; Mrs. G. L. D., Paris, Ark.; Mrs. L. L. D.; C. M. C., Wilbraham, Mass.; Mrs. W. A. P., Crown Point, N. Y.; Mrs. F. M., Santa Ana, Calif.; F. L., Elmira, N. G. P. O., Vicksburg, Mich.; R. C. H., Albion, Ohio; Marie, Topeka, Kans.; Mrs. T. L., Wolsey, S. D.; Mrs. M. B., Fulton, N. Y.

A WIFE writes in great distress: "I ask prayer that her husband who has lived happily with her for many years may resist the temptation to leave her and may overcome an infatuation which is wrecking their lives and bringing grief and disgrace to their child." Mrs. Emily Heap of Remsen, Ia., whose husband deserted her in England taking their three children, writes again to beg for prayer that her husband's heart will be softened, that he may become a Christian and that "if God does not permit me to be with my family He will bring it to pass that I may at least have my youngest child with me."

PRAYERS are asked for revivals of religion at Danbury, Texas; Fort Worth, Texas; Colville, Wash.; McCune, Kan. Questions and Answers

N. National City, Calif. 1. Please explain the verse, "Hast thou faith? Have it to thyself before God alone?" Rom. 14:22, and reconcile this verse with "Trust in the Lord with all thine heart, and lean not to thine own understanding" Prov. 3:5. 2. Is it wrong to provide refreshments in the church for an official church gathering?

Rom. 14:22 does not by any means advise us to have faith in self, but states that a man's faith is a personal matter between himself and God. It is here discussing the question of eating meat offered to the idols. Some believed it was all right to do this, but Paul advises that when this act might harm others it would be better for so-called advanced Christians to say nothing about the belief, but to forego the exercise of their freedom for the sake of others. 2. It would be impossible to consider such a thing wrong. It is fully in harmony with Bible ideas. Eating together was always a sign of fellowship and this fact emphasized in the New Testament accounts of early Christianity.

Subscriber, Hustler, Wis. What is your opinion of labor unions? Is it not against the Bible to belong to and approve of organizations whose purpose it is to secure shorter working days, more pay for less work—in short to get all they can for their members from their employers?

Long as labor unions are striving for simple justice there can be no objection to them on Scriptural grounds. The Bible insists throughout on justice. It is an indisputable fact that many employers oppress their laborers, not paying them a fair wage for their work. It is perfectly right for workers to band themselves together to insist on fair pay and reasonable working conditions. The question arises that the unions are essentially a selfish movement, but the efforts of the members of the union are for others, their wives and families and fellow workers as much as for themselves. Any movement toward actual social justice has the sanction of Christ and the Bible.

F. C., Portland, Me. Who was the inventor of the flying machine? I am told that the first flying machine was built in 1855. Is this true?

The flying machine, in the widest sense of the word, is the result of the experiments of many years, extending over more than a hundred years. The first balloon was flown by two brothers named Montgolfier in France in 1783. The first dirigible balloon, cigar-shaped and driven by propeller actuated by steam, was built by H. Giffard in 1852. In the decade between 18 and 1905 Count Zeppelin made the first dirigible that could be called practical, and Professor Langley invented the aeroplane, which the Wright Brothers improved and put to practical use.

A. P., Chicago, Ill. At what point in the world's history was the most progress made—what period of ten years?

It is claimed that the decade beginning with 1850 saw more progress in invention than any other decade in history. But it would seem that the period on which we are now entering promises to be richer in moral and spiritual progress than any former period in the world's history, as we let us hope so, and let us try to make it so.

F. T., Phoenixville, Pa. What constitutes saving faith, and what is the surest way to obtain it?

The reason that so much effort to believe appears to go to waste is that it is not definite enough. People try to believe vague, indefinite things, basing their belief on vague, indefinite arguments, and the result is that they fail of entering into a vital experience or real, affectionate communion with God and spiritual victory over sin. We must again and again come back to the question of sin. The soul must have a definite settlement with God about the sins of the past, believing that he does literally forgive them and blot out their record. There is plenty of evidence on which to base such faith as this. The Bible abounds in assurances that God will and does forgive those who ask, the death of Christ on the cross is God's greatest, all-inclusive guarantee to the world that he will forgive the sinner. To trust his love, as revealed in these assurances and in the sublime tragedy of Calvary, brings the soul into a relationship of affectionate communion with God and makes possible the entering and growth of a new nature. It is that sometimes spiritual light and life appear to come to the soul without this definite, conscious trust for the forgiveness of sins. Christ often appears to the seeking soul as the great Deliverer from darkness and perplexity, even when there is no specific plea for forgiveness. And this trust in Christ becomes far more than trust in mere forgiveness. We understand that the divine life came in this way to the disciples themselves. Christ himself, as a personal, present, divine Friend, became the solution of their problems, the bearer of their burdens, the satisfaction of their souls. And today the words are true as they were true for the disciples and for the Philippian jailer: "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." But even these souls find, if they lose this sense of the presence and power of Christ, that it is regained if they will base their faith on that matter of the forgiveness of their sins and the cleansing of their souls from sin's stain. To sum up: Saving faith is faith that God does actually deliver us from the guilt and power and results of sin. The surest way to attain it is to stop doubting God's promises and to believe that he loves you now as much as when he allowed Christ to die that your heart might be won. Although do you not ask the question, the surest way to keep saving faith is to "go on to perfection;" trust God continually for higher and greater blessings, and work with all your strength for the salvation and the welfare of others.

J. M. G., Denison, Texas. Will you please tell me something about pneumatic tubes? Have they ever been used for transporting passengers?

Pneumatic tubes are tubes through which objects are drawn by exhausting the air in front of them and thus producing suction. They are in use in the post offices of London, Paris, Berlin, Vienna and New York. In 1870 Alfred Ely Beach, one of the proprietors of the Scientific American, built a subway under Broadway, New York City, from Murray Street to Warren Street, in which passengers were carried in a car drawn through a great pneumatic tube. There have been other attempts to carry passengers by pneumatic railways, but it has not been found practicable on a large scale.

Miscellaneous

Inquirer West Brookfield, Mass. James Whitcomb Riley is the author of the poem "There, Little Girl, Don't Cry."

Mrs. O. F. Garner, 2459 Monroe Street, Chicago, requests some reader of this paper to send her a copy of the poem beginning "When I Gave my Heart to God."

W. A. F., Samsel, Okla. There may be no "harm," in the sense of doing deliberate wrong, in the things you mention, but there are many who would not regard them with approval. It has always seemed to us that a line should be drawn against any amusements or entertainments in the church which are in the slightest degree doubtful or in bad taste.

H. M. T., Argyle, N. Y. Luke says in 7:37 that the woman who brought the alabaster box of ointment was "a woman in the city, which was a sinner." There is nothing to identify her with Mary Magdalene, commentators hold. She was probably one of those who had heard the words of compassion and forgiveness from Jesus' lips and who had been drawn to him sympathetically.

Mrs. E. J. T., South Bend, Ind. It would seem from the story in Genesis that Joseph's brothers kept back from Jacob for years the truth concerning their sale of the younger brother into captivity. In Gen. 37:33-35 it is made clear that Jacob concluded he was dead. Not until the great surprise in Egypt, when Joseph revealed himself to his brethren, did the latter decide that it would be well to confess all to their father. That they did this, concealing nothing, we may infer from the last four verses of Gen. 45.

C. M. G., East End, Okla. 1. The passage in Josephus' Antiquities, Book 18, Chap. 3 referring to Jesus Christ has been claimed to be an interpolation, but this has never been clearly proved, and it appears today in the oldest edition of Josephus in existence. 2. In some parts of the East slavery still exists. We read of children being sold into slavery in China, and it is beyond question that in Mohammedan lands slavery still prevails, although to a comparatively small extent.

"Boaz and Jachin," Louisburg, N. C. The apparent discrepancy in the measurements of the temple pillars given in II Chron. 3:15 and I Kings 7:15 is explained by commentators, who point out that in the Chronicles version the joint lengths are given, while in the account in Kings the length of the pillars is given separately. Each pillar was 17½ cubits long, which in Kings is stated roundly as eighteen, while Chronicles gives their joint lengths. In our measurement the pillars were each 32½ feet long and 7 feet diameter, the height of each capital being 8½ feet. The pillars when set up would stand about 40 feet in height.

J. H. C., Minneapolis, Minn. The passage in Prov. 11:25 refers to the liberal soul, the "soul that blesses others." This promise refers both to spiritual and material benefits. "He that watereth" refreshes the souls and bodies of others, shall himself receive new supplies from the great Source of all blessing. In II Cor. 9:6 we have the reverse of the picture. The reaping corresponds to the sowing. If our heart prompts us to liberality and kindness, and the cause be unquestionably a good one, we need not hesitate, for it will come back with interest in due season. The cheerful giver is the one who gives without grudging, or remonstrance, but with a sense of fulfilling a pleasant duty.

Grain Bubbles

How They Became the King Foods

User No. 1

The first user was Prof. A. P. Anderson, the inventor of Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice.

For years and years, while he learned how to explode them, he alone knew what was coming.

Finally he shot the grains from guns. He exploded every food cell. Then, for the first time, you had whole grains with every granule made digestible.

User No. 3

Then we supplied Puffed Grains in barrels to countless candy-makers. They used them in place of nuts.

Girls fell in love with Puffed Grain candy, and they started to make it at home. No doubt millions of packages have since been used as confections—in fudge, as garnish for ice cream, and for eating dry like peanuts. They taste like toasted nuts.

User No. 2

Then we started a lunch room in the heart of New York, and thousands of men came to taste them.

Among all the ready-cooked cereals, four men in five selected Puffed Wheat or Puffed Rice.

They came day after day, month after month for them. This became the favorite lunch dish. Then we knew we had the best-liked cereals men had ever tasted.

User No. 4

Then armies of children began to demand them. They ate them with cream and sugar. They floated them in bowls of milk.

Morning, noon and night they called for cereals in puffed form. Now grocers tell us that there's not another cereal known of which users use so much. And mothers say that nothing else brings dishes back so often. These are the king foods now.

But it's not bewitching taste alone that wins folks to these foods. These are scientific grain foods—the best-cooked cereals known. By no other process are all the food cells broken.

The more you know about Puffed Grains the more you'll serve your cereals in this way. Try all of them. Each has a different taste.

VELLASTIC

Elastic Ribbed, Fleece-Lined

UNDERWEAR

VELLASTIC is made the "health" way. Scientists agree that air is a great non-conductor of heat and cold. VELLASTIC with its thick, fleece lining keeps a cushion of warm air next to the skin. The porosity of the ribbed fabric keeps this aerated fleece dry and hygienic.

The fleece, besides protecting the body from draughts and colds, is gratefully pleasant to the skin, while the elasticity of the ribbed fabric permits perfect freedom of movement, and give smooth, snug fit. VELLASTIC is so well made, so strong in fabric and stitching that it is good for two seasons' wear and will more than save its costs in doctor's bills. Write for booklet No. 10

Elisha's Heavenly Defenders

International Sunday School Lesson for October 24
II Kings 6 : 8-23

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By REV. F. B. MEYER, D.D.

"The angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear him, and delivereth them." Psa

From the front-lines of the Great War many stories have come of the celestial warriors which the soldiers say they have seen here turning back the enemy, and there bending over the wounded. We cannot disregard these statements. Scripture is full of instances of angelic watch and ward. Perhaps in the awful stress of mortal strife and pain, the veil is torn from men's eyes, and they behold the horses and chariots of fire, in which Elijah swept to heaven, and by which Elisha was surrounded. These eternal forces are first appreciated by the quickened spirit: i. e., they are subjective; and then the mind interprets them into the language of sense and gives them an objective appearance, however we explain the phenomenon, it can be no doubt of the reality of God's over his own. He covers them with his feathers, and they trust under his wings. Faithfulness is their shield and buckler. He gives his angels charge over them to keep in all their ways. I love that story of a Welsh preacher, riding in the gloaming, saw two ruffians awaiting him in a narrow section of the road, when suddenly he heard the hoofs of another horse, and a strong horseman overtook him and rode beside him on the side of danger, until they had passed, when he as suddenly disappeared!

Seers and Blind Men

By Arthur H. Howland

THERE are two kinds of people who object to miracles and who try to convince themselves that the miracles of the Bible are not true. The first object to miracles because they object to God himself. Anything that reminds them of God, of his presence, his power, his interference in the affairs of men, annoys them. Incidentally, and as there has been frequent occasion to state, religious teachers and workers need to keep this fact in mind—that naturally people do not like God. This is the essence of the doctrine of sin; and in this fact is seen man's chiefest need for salvation.

But another class of people find the narratives of miracles distasteful. They love God, but they like things to be regular. Any irregularities, any exceptions, offend and distress them. They like to see rules work; they like universality; it upsets them to have strange, uncanny things happening. Further, to their minds, miracles seem unfair. Some specially favored person is getting helped, and others who need help just as much are being missed. They want to see everybody have an equal chance with the laws of nature, and resent the thought that the laws are suspended for some and operative for the rest.

Now the first class of people will not enjoy this study of Elisha and the Syrian band at all. It is full of the thought of God, and will make them uncomfortable. But the second class will enjoy it. They will forget the discomfort of reading about magical doings in the delight of realizing and contemplating the great fact that God is on hand to give his limitless help to those who will—open their eyes.

The story itself is so familiar that there is no need to retell it here. Read it over, either in lesson leaf or Bible, and then notice some special spots.

"Fear not." That was the first essential difference between the two men on the housetop. One was afraid; the other was not. The one who was afraid was blind; the one who was not saw wondrous things.

So Elisha surprised his servant by saying, "Stop being afraid. Open your eyes. Look! There are more on our side than on theirs."

You, in your fear, see only the army at the door. I see a bigger army that will put this one to flight."

THERE is a verse in the New Testament which seems like an echo of this. "Greater is He that is in you than he that is in the world." (I John 4:4). The forces that are leading and controlling the world seem great. But the forces that are leading and controlling and energizing the Christian are greater. In the world, strife, greed, hatred, sin; in the Christian peace, love, holiness. How can we let our fears make us blind to our resources and our powers? With the world, whatever powers there may be, seen and unseen, with us, God!

So the young man's eyes were opened, and he saw the truth, saw the fact, saw the evidence that all the limitless resources of God were at the disposal of a man who was being true to the man who was not afraid, the man who would open his eyes.

The prophets were called seers. They could see things that others could not see. Poets are seers; artists are seers. Other people observe the external, the incidentals, the statistical; seers see the soul, the real thing; they catch the meaning; they give the message to those who are blind.

Now this is not a matter of mystery, of miracle, of uncanny appearances. Back of every actual thing is an actual thing, a spiritual entity. What is a sunset? A few bunches of mist have to sag down toward the ground anywhere from eight to thirty miles away from where we stand; certain rays from the sun, which intervening hills or clouds hide from our eyes, strike these files of vapor in such a manner that certain prismatic effects are produced. That is all that science has to say about it. What says the poet, the artist, the seer, the saint, the child? They say that a new world is being revealed; they say that the windows of heaven are being opened; they say they behold alluring beauties. They declare that by looking at the sunset they find true answers to hard problems; that they get strength for life's work, patience for its trials; that they find joy to offset life's sorrows; they say that they find love to conquer life's quarrels; they say they find peace and joy—and God.

What can the sneering scientist say to these seers? Nothing. The blessings they get from the sunset cannot be measured and located by his tape and chains, his theodolites, his angle bisecting prisms, his barometers, nor even his telescopes.

We do not need to be actually seers or poets to be real seers. And the big and strenuous things are, after all, done by its seers.

The Angels of Mons

MEN say that they saw angels. Some may doubt. And others may explain: But when strong foes gather round about Who says that faith is vain?

That which a man has sown his hands must reap: The choice may be his own: They watch the host of Heaven still shall keep When we seem most alone.

Some clearly see, some wonder if they saw. Not trusting human sight, Clinging more closely to the common law Dazed by the sudden light;

But in those hours of peril and of prayer— Vision, or sight, or dream, Seen or unseen the angel hosts are there, And God is still supreme.

B. G. A., in the Glasgow Herald.

AMONG the deepest of life's tragedies are the histories of souls who, for some reason or another, lose this power of seeing these immaterial things. I once saw a poet in a poem describing how a poet to his soul vision and so of course his ability to make poetry. I can remember nothing about the poem but the first words of the first line:

You Can Weigh Exactly What You Should

You can be Strong, Vigorous—full of Health and Energy.

You can be free from Chronic Ailments—every organ of your body as nature intended.

You can have a Clear Skin.

You can have a Good Figure—as good as any woman.

You can increase or reduce your weight.

No longer need to say what "I can do" but what "I HAVE DONE." I have helped 75,000 of the most cultured, intelligent women of America to arise to the very best—why not you?

No Drugs—No Medicines

My pupils simply comply with Nature's Laws.

What My Pupils Say:

"Everyone notices the change in my complexion. I have lost that yellow color."

"Just think what you have done for me. Last year I weighed 215 lbs., this year 146, and have not gained an ounce back. I am not wrinkled either. I feel so young and strong, no rheumatism, or sluggish liver. I can breathe now, too. It is surprising how easily I did it. I feel 15 years younger."

"Just think I have not had a pill or a cathartic since I began, and I used to take one every night."

"My weight has increased 30 lbs. I don't know what indigestion is any more, and my nerves are so rested! I sleep like a baby."

"I feel as if I could look every man, woman and child in the face with the feeling that I am growing—spiritually, physically and mentally. Really I am a stronger, better woman. I don't know how to tell you or to thank you."

Reports like these come to me every day. Do you wonder I want to help every woman to vibrant health and happiness? I tell me your faults of health or figure. Your confidence is held in strict confidence. If I cannot help you, I will tell you what will.

My interesting book tells how to stand and walk correctly and contains other information of vital interest to women. You are welcome to it. Write for it. FREE. If you do not need me, you may be a help to a dear friend. I have had a wonderful experience and I'd like to tell you about it. I am at my desk daily from 8 until 5.

"The poet sinned—"

That was enough. He could not see, nor write after that. The same thing has been put into fiction. The same tragedy has been lived out in many a life. The same tragedy is beginning anew every day for some one.

It need not be sin. It need only be a wrong choice. A choosing of something else rather than the gift of sight, and the career of the prospective poet or prospective artist is blocked.

But in the career of sainthood it is sin that blinds and blocks us. Not necessarily what are called big sins; usually, indeed, it is a so-called little sin. Something takes our eyes away from the light; something steals into our heart that we choose instead of Christ; some duty is shirked; some indulgence allowed; some doubt entertained—and we find our vision dull and our soul weak, fearful, defeated again. We had forgotten Paul's warning: "Neglect not the gift that is in thee." We have failed to meet St. Paul's fine challenge: "I was not disobedient to the heavenly vision."

Even the juniors can be made to feel the necessity of being true to conscience and, in every case, to the higher and richer, rather than the lower and cheaper things.

"Alas, my master, how shall we do?" cried the young man when the enemy appeared at the gate.

Elisha's answer will apply to every similar difficulty: "Lord, I pray thee, open his eyes that he may see."

Echoes from the Holy Land

THE scenes of this lesson lie around the borders of the plain of Esdraelon, which was not only the great battlefield of the great nations of antiquity, but in all ages the place of border warfare between the powers who ruled in Damascus and those who ruled in Palestine.

"The Syrians are come down," a distance of at least a hundred miles. Those raids then as now almost always occur at night, with the attack at dawn; the routes chosen are those apart from the well-beaten roads. They frequently form the prelude to larger military operations as in this particular case they preceded the awful siege of Samaria—verse 24. Such raids by Bedawin tribes were a common occurrence in this same region as late as fifty years ago and ceased only when the present government succeeded in rendering them impossible.

"One of his servants." Some have curiously guessed that this servant may have been Naaman, the healed leper, whose marvelous cure made him regard the prophet as almost omniscient.

"Speaketh in thy bedchamber." A British ambassador once had occasion to tell a Grand Vizier of Turkey that he had incontestable proof that there sat at the Grand Vizier's table every evening a man who reported all that passed to the ambassador of another power the next morning. It is said that the police of Paris and London vie with each other year after year in their claim that no important crime ever goes undiscovered. It was once wittily said of the police of Beirut, under the old regime, that they surpassed those of London and Paris in the fact that they knew of every crime and robbery before it occurred.

Dothan. The plain of Dothan is one of the side bays or southern extension of the famous plain of Esdraelon. The town of Dothan on a hill top commanded the narrow pass from the north into the hills of Samaria. A very ancient highway led through this pass, recalling the sale of Joseph to the Ishmaelites who passed this way to Egypt. The building of railways is the only thing which can ever change these ancient routes, and even the railroads must in the main keep to them also. Along the same route stalk lines of camels today bearing wheat and oil to Egypt, almost exactly the same burdens they carried three thousand years ago.

The act of the king of Israel in response to the advice of Elisha in feeding the fragment of the bewildered army led into Samaria, is truly Oriental, and when once they had been allowed to taste salt in the city of the enemy their lives were safe for at least that raid.

Make Others Happy

WHEN rain beats down and ail is drear,
As often is the way,
With happy smile I will recall
What grandma used to say.
"Why, bless your heart, it doesn't help
To let the tears drip too;
Just wipe your eyes and look around
For some good deed to do."

With glee three letters she'd repeat Just M. O. H. were they;
Yet what their meaning we knew not,
For did we ask, she'd say:
"Why, that's my motto, and I've learned,
The very wisest plan
Is to find out what others need,
And help them if you can!"

With each success, as we would seek
Some helpful act to do,
We found that cheering other lives
Brightened our own lives, too.
I told her this one day, and plead,
"M. O. H. please make clear."
Then smiling sweetly, she replied,
"Make Others Happy, dear!"

When stormy days give you the blues,
Just help to set things right;
Kind acts will fill the darkest day
With sweetness and with light.
Look up the real unfortunates,
And ease their aches and pains,
As you make others happy, dear,
You just forget it rains."

Accidents Will Happen

Poor little kiddie, he didn't mean to spill Daddy's coffee—but it's not serious. Fels-Naptha Soap will take out the stains in a jiffy, so there's no harm done.

But oh, my! Here's Johnny bumped his head and had the nose-bleed all over his clean white blouse! And blood-stains are so hard to get out—unless you use Fels-Naptha Soap. Then they're no trouble at all.

Gracious me! The cat's spilled the jam in the clothes basket! But Mother's not worried. She'll just put the clothes to soak as usual, with Fels-Naptha Soap and after 30 minutes or so the stains will be all loosened and ready to wash out with a few light rubs:

But here's an accident that couldn't happen to an up-to-date housekeeper. Unexpected company to supper, and no supper ready because Mrs. Waybehind has just finished her washing.

If she would only use Fels-Naptha Soap and let it do the hard work while her clothes are soaking, her washing would be done and hanging on the line by noon. Fels-Naptha makes hard-rubbing unnecessary and saves time and strength. Then company would be welcome, because she wouldn't be too tired to enjoy it.

The naptha in Fels-Naptha is not only on the wrapper, but in the soap, combined with other wonderful cleansers.

That's why Fels-Naptha so quickly, thoroughly and easily gets rid of dirt and grease—not only in clothes, but in every soap-and-water task about the home.

A BIT gaspingly we struggled up the last stretch of hillside, the Smiling Lady and I. A warm twilight lay all around us—a warm dust crept up over our shoes and powdered them with a vague gray coating. Neither of us spoke, for in the business of climbing hills one can be both sociably inclined and quiet.

It grew darker as we climbed, so much darker that pine trees were huge bulks which rose out of nothing, and occasional bushes loomed like wan little ghosts by the wayside. The Smiling Lady's light dress made a soft rustle by my side. The wind in the low bushes made little echoing rustles in front of me. Still in silence we gained the summit of the hill.

We seemed higher up than usual. Perhaps it was the misty darkness that filled the land; perhaps it was the nearness of the great silver stars that hung low above us in the sky. At any rate, the valley that lay at the foot of the hill seemed infinitely far off and infinitely precious. The church spire, not more than a mile distant, looked leagues away, and the tiny cluster of houses around the church looked like a toy village left by some drowsy giant child who had been called to bed.

As we stood there, looking down, a light suddenly blazed from one of the cottages—the cheery light from some window lamp. As we watched it, another light gleamed out, and another. Isolated little homes far off on isolated little hills sent out their golden beams, until the night blossomed wistfully, tenderly with lights.

The Smiling Lady broke a silence that was growing oppressive. "It's beautiful," she said, "isn't it?" As I looked at her I saw her eyes gleaming in the shadows. Did they have a smile in them—or tears?

"And every light belongs to some one, doesn't it?" I ventured timidly. "And we shall never know just whom they are burning for."

THE Smiling Lady's hand fell gently on my arm. Her eyes followed the ribbon of road that led on through the firefly army of lamps.

She quoted softly:

"Oh, near lights and far lights,
And every light a home,
And how they gladden, sadden us,
Who late and early roam.
But near lights and far lights,
Through flash and gleam we speed
Across the darkness to a light
We know, we love, we need!"

The Smiling Lady stopped abruptly. She drew her hand across her eyes.

"That verse," I told her, "is lovely. Who wrote it?"

"Why," answered the Smiling Lady, "I don't really know. I cut it out of a paper, I liked it so much, and I pinned it on the wall of my den. I loved it so much. And I've remembered it—it comes back to me at times like this."

And I—I too have remembered the little verse. And it comes back to me sometimes when I am sitting at my desk writing; sometimes when I am watching the snow fly past the window; snow that whirls across a dreary landscape and screens a drearier sky. And when I think of the lines,

"Near lights and far lights,
And every light a home,"

I see the vague, twilighted picture of a hillside lined with trees. I see a church spire outlined dimly against a dark sky; I see huge near-enough-to-pick stars and small far-off lights. I see the Smiling Lady's eyes with a light in them that might have been soft laughter or softer tears.

I have remembered the verse because I loved it, but I have never discovered who wrote the verse. I have never tried to find out, for somehow it was a message that came to me out of the twilight world, and somehow it does not exactly need a big poet's name to make it beautiful, nor would some poet's name lessen the value of

VERY often, out of nowhere a particular, a line of poetry or a sentence from some book, or the memory of some forgotten painting comes back to you—whoever you are. So it is when your mind is afar off and you yourself humming some snatch of song that you cannot seem to place. And unfortunately, these snatches of long sentences or poems are not always beautiful. Sometimes the remembered does not exactly give you pleasure.

There are writers and artists and poets that the world praises with a will and there are other poets and artists and writers that the world never recognizes; but they one and all live an equal responsibility, a responsibility that few of them thoroughly realize the greatness of. For the inspiration, or lack of inspiration, that created a carelessly drawn picture or a carelessly written sentence may find a dwelling place in a mind that it may injure, as a woodpecker injures a tree. So a poem written without any thought of its selling value may do as much harm as some little verse, lying unpublished in a dusty desk drawer, might have done good.

But the responsibility doesn't stop with professional folk.

I know two girls. They use to be the best of friends and then suddenly a coolness grew up between them—a great coolness. They bowed politely when they met on the street they passed each other coldly by if they met at a party or tea. Finally, because I was curious, I spoke to one of them.

"Why," I asked her, "do you and Ellen seem to dislike each other? You used to be such great friends."

The girl laughed a hard, disagreeable little laugh.

"Ellen and I never had a quarrel," she told me; "but she said something to me—something mean. It was something that I couldn't forget. I told her. As time went on I couldn't talk to her or see her without remembering what she had said. Pretty soon I disliked seeing her and talking to her because it made me remember. So we aren't friends any more."

Not long after, the other girl came to me.

"I fancy," she began out of a clear sky, "I fancy that Alice has been telling you of our quarrel?"

"She said," I answered, picking my words rather carefully, "that you didn't quarrel. She said that you had drifted apart."

"Did she give any reason for this—drifting?" questioned the girl.

There was no other way out of it, so I decided to tell the whole truth.

"I gathered from her remark," I answered, "that it was something that you said, something horrid, that made the difference."

The girl tossed her head. "Was something that I said before I thought," she told me; "something that I didn't really mean. But somehow it made all the difference in the world. All our friendship will never be the same."

It's rather an awful thing to do in a friendship with a chance remark that you didn't mean.

Oh, writers and artists and poets—people who speak too quick and carelessly, try to put inspiration and thought and a bit of love into your verse or your colors or your music. Try to remember that your chance thought coming back with perhaps not thinking of its origin, may hurt some one and make some heart heavy.

And, people who have expressed beautiful thoughts that folk have not seemed to appreciate, try to remember that somewhere your words may bring the radiance of a light home light, shining far out into the nighttime of some lonely soul.

In the days of our fathers it took ten days to hold a revival. These days it takes ten days to begin one.

Bringing the Church into the Home

MY SON and daughter are not interested in the church. I can't persuade them to attend or take part in any of the activities of the church," a man said recently to his pastor.

What are you going to make the church a part of your home?" was the clergyman's quick rejoinder.

The father, arraigned, thought a moment. Then he answered very honestly and candidly. "We are not doing anything," he said.

The same question put to a thousand parents would be likely to draw the same reply from ninety per cent. To the church regularly, to see that the children go to Sunday school, this constitutes for most of us our home Christianity. But the every-day religion that makes the Bible, with its wealth of poetry, story and drama, the children's beloved home book; that brings it into the daily conversation of the family as the home's ever present guest, and that makes prayer as natural as breathing, has been relegated to a past. We put on our religion once or twice a week as we put on the children's Sunday coats and shoes. It is the intimate, homely matter that would make it more helpful to the individual as a working propaganda for life. Our casual attitude toward religion, the days of the week makes a one-sided fight for the churches on the seventh day. More than this, it wrecks the children spiritually. We ought to bring religion into the home for the sake of the children, early in their development, that it may enter into every rule, arrangement and fiber of their lives, going to be as natural for them as eating or sleeping.

The clergyman whom I know has two daughters. They are popular among the young people of the town; they are allowed to wear dainty clothes and go to temple parties and entertain gracefully at home. They have learned the art of cooking and serving tasteful meals, and they are at liberty to invite the young men friends to their home for supper on Wednesday nights.

This is their night, and the table glows with their graceful hospitality. The young men guests realize, in the simplicity of the perfectly wholesome entertainment, their dreams of future lives of their own. But directly the supper is finished an unusual ceremony takes place. Just as she has been accustomed to do ever since she was able to read, Margaret brings her father the Bible, having found a passage of scripture or a beautiful psalm that they all know and love. Dorothy takes her place at the piano and opens a hymnal to a favorite hymn. After the singing is finished and the family and the guests, grouped about the piano, have sung the hymn in the pleasant glow of the candle light, they all kneel and join in a short prayer.

How can the young people be anything but physically and spiritually refreshed after such an experience? How can such a spiritual bath could the rest of the evening degenerate into anything harmful or unwholesome? The most significant part of it all is that the boys and girls are so used to this daily family worship that they have made it a matter of habit. There is nothing strained or unusual or stilted about it to them. To eat is part of the day's work. To pray is also a part of it and as natural. These girls have been brought up to feel that there is a spiritual hunger which must be fed. It is noteworthy that the other evening girls and boys in these girls' social "set" are all church members and engaged in active church work.

THE average home finds time for everything but family worship. The lack in the life of the churches of today is a line of instability, and this is directly traceable to the same lack in the home. God is relegated to the pulpit. He is shut out of the home living-room. The great value of some simple form of family worship that can be conducted by the mother or even one of the older children is that it reaches the emotional life of the child early. It enters his being at so impressionable a time and so thoroughly that he will be in no more danger of losing it than he is of losing his backbone.

Begin this home worship with a Bible reading that will interest the children. Select a story; Samuel, Rebecca at the well, the Abraham cycle, Ruth and Naomi, Cain and Abel, the Jacob cycle, the stories of Moses; and from the New Testament, the stories of Christ's early life and miracles. Later, when the children have learned to concentrate upon brief daily Bible stories, read the Sermon on the Mount, brief passages from the teachings of John and Paul, and those pictorial psalms that take one out of doors and into an environment of peaceful shepherding, heroic battling for the right, and a deeper appreciation of the elemental life.

A spiritual song or hymn should follow the Bible reading as a relaxation for the children. In selecting this endeavor to make it fit in theme and thought the central thought of the Bible reading. This is so simple a matter and makes the quiet hour much more of a unit for the children. The reading of the twenty-third psalm may be followed by singing "The King of Love my Shepherd is," or "Jesus, Tender Shepherd." An account of the marching of the Israelites will suggest the singing of "Onward, Christian Soldiers," and the beautiful idyl of Ruth and Naomi can be appropriately accompanied by singing Martin Luther's harvest hymn: "We Plow the Fields."

The end of this simple family worship comes in a short prayer, every word of which may be understood and loved and remembered. For any who prefer printed prayers there are a number of choice collections. For the very youngest children there is John Martin's Book of Prayers. Later, Stevenson's prayers may be used, full of the spirit of peace and hope. What could be more exquisite for the children to learn for home use than this anonymous prayer:

"Lord, support us all the day long of this troublous life, until the shadows lengthen and the evening comes and the busy world is hushed and the fever of life is done. Then, in thy great mercy, grant us a safe lodging and a holy peace and rest at the end. Amen."

A good many parents know very little about the Sunday school which their children attend. They reason that it is a school connected with the church, which meets on Sunday, and where, for half an hour, young people are taught the Bible by volunteer teachers. But seeing that children are well dressed and attend Sunday school regularly with the knowledge that a deposit will be made there in their minds of a certain number of Scriptural quotations and theological truths is not bringing the Sunday school into the home in the right way. Parents need to visit the Sunday school. They need to know who is teaching their impressionable boys and girls, and what is being taught them. The Sunday school lesson should be as much the home study of the parents as it is the children's. Auxiliary references may be looked up and descriptions of the lands, peoples, customs, and the life of the period may be the topic of home research during the week.

Joining the church means that there must be home cooperation to keep the flame that has been lighted burning. The boy or girl must be encouraged to do something for the church, which will also involve activity that has a connection with the home. Through a continuation of the home religious life these young people of ours should be brought face to face with the manhood of Christ; they should discuss frankly and honestly the principles of a Christian life and how they may conform their own lives to it. The child at this period should belong to some uplift society. Whether this be the King's Daughters, a Sunshine Club, a Boy or Girl Scout group, the Young Men's or Young Women's Christian Association, the Knights of King Arthur, the Christian Endeavor, or what, it involves doing something for God. This is the flaming torch to light the progress of the child's soul.

HARTSHORN SHADE ROLLERS

Explosives

A PAPER by Major Edward P. O'Hern, of the United States Army, deals with explosives and their composition, uses, and results. The author divides explosives into three classes, progressive or propelling explosives, known as low explosives; detonating explosives, or high explosives; and detonators or fulminates. Black gunpowder, smokeless powder, and black blasting powders are known as low explosives, for certain of which, such as smokeless powder, the explosion does not differ in principle from the burning of a piece of wood. The combustion is very rapid, but is a surface action proceeding from layer to layer until the grain is consumed. In high explosives such as dynamite, nitro-glycerin, gun-cotton, etc., the velocity of the detonating wave has been determined for some materials to be approximately four miles per second. The progressive emission of a gas from a low explosive produces a pushing effect upon a projectile, whereas the conversion of an equal weight of dynamite or nitroglycerin would develop such high pressure as to rupture the gun. The action of fulminates is much more brusque and powerful than that of the high explosives. They are used in primers and fuses in both low and high explosives. One of the most important fulminates is fulminate of mercury, which produces a pressure of about 48,000 atmospheres.—Smithsonian Institution Bulletin.

The Mission With the Hardest Job in the World

ARABIA is the most difficult of the fields in which Protestant missionaries are now working. The climate, primitive mode of living, difficulties of travel, distance from the base of supplies, fanaticism and ignorance of the people and the fact that the country is almost wholly under the control of native chiefs, not under civilized governments, are all hindrances to freedom in preaching the Gospel of Christ. In view of these and other obstacles the progress of the Arabian Mission during the past twenty-five years is noteworthy and the heroism of the men and women who have gone out into the field is inspiring to Christians at home.

The Arabian Mission, in celebrating its Twenty-fifth Anniversary, is conducting a campaign for $25,000 for advanced work. Never before has its work been so interesting or so promising. Readers of the Christian Herald may want to share in the wonderful work of the Arabian Mission in the Cradle of Islam.

Gifts are sought as follows:
Seven gifts of $1,000 each,
$7,000; 20 gifts of $500 each,
$10,000; 50 gifts of $100 each,
$5,000; 100 gifts of $25

each, $2,500; 50 gifts of $10 each, $500; a total of 227 donors, $25,000.

One special need is for a Women's Dispensary at Kuwait. Dr. Eleanor Taylor Calverley, whose portrait appears on this page, has spent five years in Arabia. She has conducted pioneer medical work for the Arab women in two rooms of a dilapidated native house in Kuwait.

Three thousand dollars are required to build a suitable dispensary to accommodate her ministry of healing.

Contributions may be sent to The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York City, marked "For the Arabian Mission, 25th Anniversary Fund," or especially "For Dr. Calverley's Dispensary for Arab Women."

Mrs. Edwin E. Calverley, one of the four women physicians of the Arabian Mission, was born in New Jersey, educated in Connecticut, and is a graduate of the Woman's Medical College, of Pennsylvania.

At one of the conferences in New York in connection with the anniversary Dr. Samuel M. Zwemer, in speaking of the beginning of this work said: "Many people said the doors were closed; that the task was impossible; that it was hopeless to try even to enter Arabia. Instead of hopeless and fruitless, twenty-five years find our mission strongly established."

"As Thy Days So Shall Thy Strength Be"

WHAT impressed me most when I met Sister Gilbert was the fact that she took a few minutes to tell of her trials, but would spend much time telling of all the things she had to be thankful for.

These words spoken by her pastor at the funeral services of Mrs. Mattie E. Gilbert who died recently at Ridgeland, Miss., give the real secret of the remarkable life story of the patience and faith of this woman of God. Mrs. F. P. Henderson, a neighbor and friend, writes as follows:

"When I first met her she could get around only in her wheel chair, could not move either foot; she was helpless and had been in this condition for four years. She told me how she cried almost day and night for weeks, when she knew she could not walk. 'Then,' she said, 'I got to thinking that the Lord must have wanted me to be so afflicted, or it would not be so. I knew my husband and little boys felt so bad and so I began to read my Bible, and it has comforted me. And now I do not worry, for I know if I never walk here, I will in heaven. But,' she said, 'I believe the Lord will let me walk again.' And he did."

"Her husband and sons were very kind to her. They were not able to hire any help, so she would sit in a low chair and have a pan of flour brought to her and she would make the bread for the family. Her sons would bring everything to her, and do everything she could not do. Then, one afternoon, her husband and sons with a neighbor and son went to Pearl River to fish and bathe. The boys were brought home dead. Both had been drowned, the older going to help the younger, and neither being able to swim. Can you imagine anything more terrible than the grief of that father and mother? I have seen people in trouble but nothing so bad as this. For weeks we thought she would never smile again.

"But she took this, as everything else, to her heavenly Father and soon was her old sweet patient self again. It is nearly six years since her children were buried in one grave."

"A little more than two years ago, her husband was buried beside their boys. She then went home to the old father and mother who were still spared. And what a comfort she has been not only to them but to the brothers and sisters, for whom her prayer was always that they might be brought into the Kingdom."

"Less than a week ago she was about her work as usual, having gotten so that she could walk, although always lame, when she was taken with sudden pains in the head and died almost instantly."

"How we miss our dear friend! Pray for the aged parents, the brothers and sisters and nephews and nieces in whose happiness and welfare she was so greatly interested."

The Redemption of Kafirland

IT is a wonderful change that the gospel makes in the very appearance of the Kafirs of Kafirland, remarks a writer in The Signs of the Times. Here are some of the raw heathen Kafirs,—Red Kafirs, they are called, because they still smear their bodies with red earth. When I saw the tears of joy flowing down their cheeks as we studied of God and heaven and the coming of the Saviour, and as I heard the children of these people, so recently Red Kafirs, reading creditably in English as well as in Kafir, and singing the English hymns in those mud huts, my heart kept saying, What a glorious and wonderful change!

of wounds, and 224,586 died of disease, giving a total of 359,528 deaths officially recorded. With those who died from wounds or illness after coming home it is probable that the losses from the war were above 500,000 men on the Union side and not far off of that on the Southern.

The money cost of the war to the North was $3,400,000,000. The cost to the South was almost all she had. The Union was worth the cost; yes, and unless the temper of men is relaxed the nation will yet again be saved by a cost beside which this one of the sixties is a mere bagatelle.

The cost of the war is not all included in the figures quoted here. The totals are merely the statistician's cost. The real cost must be told in large measures. There is no estimate of heartaches, of widows left without support to raise families of fatherless children, of men maimed and stricken before their time, useless at their trade and too old to learn another suit to their disabilities, condemned to live on a meager pittance and exist as they might, other men permanently handicapped by disease born of the swamps and hardships through which they served. The actual money cost of the war has mounted through the operation of the pension system to an additional $4,633,511,926.71, and the pension payments of 1915 will be about $17,000,000. The human cost can never be computed; we are still paying it and will continue to pay it through several generations yet unborn.

It is what we face when we talk of possible future wars. While we give honor to the heroes of '65 let us take counsel and so shape our plans and our endeavors that we may avoid the necessity of making more heroes in 1915.

What Peace Has Wrought

The fifty years since '65 have seen an almost complete rebuilding of the fabric of civilization. The railways of '65 considered thirty miles an hour high speed. The Pullman car had not yet been invented, and the limited trains of today with their dining car, barber shops and wireless telegraphs were not even dreamed of. Even today these trains would still be a matter of the future but for the air line first offered to the railway world by George Westinghouse in 1875, and the automatic block signal system, invented in 1871. Telegraphy was perfected before the war and rendered yeoman service to the armies of both sides; but even then the sending radius was limited, and messages had to be frequently repeated. Today the limit of land telegraphy is the limit of the continents, and the wireless has annihilated space. The sewing machine was still a crude affair in '65. The typewriter was unknown. The printing press that today sends millions of extras into the hands of multitudes is an invention of the years since '65. The linotype machine, which with the improved press has created the modern newspaper, is scarcely yet of age. Pneumatic caisson excavation has made possible great tunnels under the Hudson, East River and Boston Harbor. The invention of reinforced concrete construction has robbed the fire demon of much of his opportunity for destruction, and has brought cheaper buildings and greater security as well as beautifying the crossings of many streams. The Bessemer process and the open-hearth process, with the improvements in mill machinery, have given us the steel skeleton building, while electric and hydraulic elevators have given convenient access to every floor that the architect and builder dare to give us. The electric railway is entirely a product of the fifty years, the first practical electric engine having been demonstrated by Thomas Edison in 1882. The gasoline engine was not perfected for general use till late in the 80's; yet there is hardly a farm today without its never tiring, every ready gasoline-eating hired man, and the automobile has taken our highways for its own.

The electric light has come within the last twenty-five years, beginning with the first crude incandescent lamp, then the arc lamp and then back again to the incandescent until the Mazda lamp and the nitrogen-filled globe seem to have brought lighting efficiency to ultimate perfection. The aeroplane today is carrying mails and passengers, and doing scouting work for armies, and even attacking fortifications with deadly effect. Education has kept pace with invention. The university man of today is equipped as no other man has ever been before him, by schools which the people have created and which they maintain, knowing that the security of free governments lies in the banishing of ignorance.

has happened since last week, action has been reduced to bomb-throwing from opposing trenches and to mining operations.

On the Eastern front the Germans are struggling hard to regain the offensive temporarily assumed in part by the Russians. General von Linsingen has recaptured Lutsk and forced the Russians backward in Volhynia. General von Hindenburg's left and center have been able to approach closer to his objective, the city of Dvinsk, which the Russians are holding in force and defending stubbornly and as yet successfully, having driven von Hindenburg's right back on 8 to 10 miles toward Vilna.

The latest available reports show that the successful drive of the Allies against the Germans in the West has netted gains approximately as follows: East of Ypres at Hooge the British have maintained a slight gain. They hold the towns of Loos and Hulluch west of Lens and some terrain east of the town including a hill known as Hill No. 6 which is of great strategic value; the new front here extending about 5 miles. North of Hulluch German counter attacks regained some yards of trenches and trenches east of Loos have changed hands at least twice. South of Loos toward Arras the French have advanced through the town of Souchez to Chiverny Wood, where at least one line of former German trenches is in French hands; and they have made some progress east of Neuville. Along a front of more than fifteen miles in the Champagne country the French have advanced north of the towns of Souvaine, Perthes, Le Mesnil, Beausejour, Massiges and Ville sur Turbe, taking the German first line trenches and penetrating north of Beausejour for nearly two miles to a hill known as No. 185 the loss of which the Germans admit. The losses to each side in this offensive cannot be far under 150,000 men killed, wounded and captured.

On the Russian front the Germans report the capture of the town of Smorgon south of Dvinsk where Field Marshal von Hindenburg's right wing has broken through the Russian lines. The captures registered by the German War Office for September on the eastern front are reported as 96,000 men, 37 cannon and 298 machine guns. There has apparently been little change in the long eastern front since the German recapture of the fortress of Lutsk. Berlin reports the repulse of Russian attacks over most of the front but neither Berlin nor Petrograd reports any striking successes or admits any serious check.

The Balkan situation is not yet clear. German officers are reported as present in Bulgaria to direct operations. Premier Venizelos in an address to the Greek Parliament, evidenced Greek distrust of Bulgarian intentions and France is reported to have spurred England and Italy to unite with her in the immediate despatch of an army to Salonica to march to the aid of Serbia and to protect Greece. The landing of this force was reported by Budapest on September 29th.

A War Jaunt in Serbia

The French camp at Belgrade is most complete. There are two skilled helpers to each plane, besides the mechanic. One large motor truck is maintained for each machine. In two hours the entire field may be moved, the hangars are portable and can be packed onto the motor trucks ready to start. These motor trucks are 22-horse power Berliet type, and have steel drum wheels instead of spokes, so that they can follow the aeroplane in its course over any kind of field. At this camp at Banjitsa there are ten aero pilots and eighty others, all part of this aviation camp. They have their own shoemaker and tailor. The barber is kept busy. The camp is illuminated by electricity, a big field protected by a wireless lookout who makes instant report of the approach of the enemy. Three miles away on the river front is another wireless station in charge of the English. The two operators work together in their lookouts.

AN IDEA of the surrounding country will give one the real situation from the French side. The English battery, Belgrade's strongest defense, with 200 officers and men (and more coming every day), is about a mile and one-half east of the heart of Belgrade on a large hill overlooking the Danube. There are a number of masked guns. Besides this the Russian submarines in the Danube, patrolling up and down and equipped with wireless, are tireless in their work of protecting their allies. Three miles south of the English battery is Banjitsa, where the French aeroplane base is located.

From what the French aviators learned the Austrian aeroplane base is eight miles north of the Danube directly north of Belgrade. What the real strength of this base is I could not learn, but they make use of monoplanes more than of biplanes.

The only evidence of the work done by the Austrian planes, according to the French, was on a hill south of Belgrade, where several small private homes were completely wrecked by air bombs.

One of the deadly inventions due to the use of the aeroplane was shown me. It is known as the fourchette, a steel dart so constructed that its point lands upon a given object with deadly effect. A war plane carries a box of one hundred of these darts. At the turn of a crank these hundred arrows fall with death-dealing force to the earth. In experimenting with the fourchette to determine its accuracy in warfare, an aeroplane from the height of 3,000 feet dropped a load of these arrows over an enclosure fifty feet in diameter containing a herd of cattle which was about to be slaughtered. All were killed and very few of the darts fell outside of the enclosure. The darts penetrated the vitals of the cattle and death was instantaneous. The arrow is an invention of the French. Its effect is so ghastly, however, that they are loath to make use of it, only resorting to it when the Germans or Austrians attempt its use.

[These arrows are said to be made in the United States in great quantities.—EDITOR.]

BELGRADE is all that Serbia has. Belgrade is a ruin! The railroad station has been destroyed, and no attempt has been made to rebuild it because it lies upon the Save River, a few hundred feet from Austrian position on the other side, so the Belgrade trains now stop at Topchida, about three miles southwest of Belgrade. The boulevards and avenues are lighted at night by feeble small electric lights, shaded overhead as a safeguard against aeroplane raids. A large percentage of Belgrade citizenry has moved out of the city, many of the best families going to Nish. Business is being transacted, but all one sees are soldiers. Portions of the town bordering the river are entirely deserted. Street car system has been abandoned and only two of the hotels are open. The University of Belgrade is completely demolished. It is the chief ruin pointed out to the stranger by the heart-broken Serb.

Wood is very high, and has increased four hundred per cent. in cost. Wood and coke are the chief articles of fuel. Matches are so scarce that people are using a worsted ribbon and flint to take their place. One is amazed to find German signs, put up before the war, still in place. Many of these signs, however, advertise a favorite brew of beer, sad reminders of what once was a favorite drink. Austrians perhaps do not know it, but Belgrade has gone dry and prohibition is now a fact in a city where beer-drinking formerly was one of the pleasures of the day.

The prevalence of women wearing mourning is one of the striking sights. In fact, it seemed as if all the women folks wore black. All the government buildings and the two royal palaces are now mere monuments dented with shrapnel and disfigured with shell holes. An old Serbian soldier stands in front of these buildings just as was the practice when governmental work was being carried on there. At the American consulate, which is less than six hundred yards from the Austrian positions, only one bullet has shown itself from the Austrian fire. This happened three months ago while the consul, a Virginian, was away. An Austrian bullet came through the window of the room occupied by Vice-Consul Thompson, missed his head and went through the head of a little dog owned by Thompson, and the dog still lives. Thompson put an American flag on the mast of the British legation, took over its affairs, and although no business is carried on in it, has succeeded in saving the building from the Austrian gunfire.

Every habitated house in Belgrade has the cellar door always left ajar so that the people living there can quickly descend should the Austrians start an air raid. The police record every new arrival and passports are carefully examined.

Railroad communication between Belgrade and Nish is very well protected. The old classes like the class of '85 are doing sentry duty along the railroad tracks. Picturesque characters, they attract attention as they stand at attention while the train goes by. The crops between Belgrade and Nish are abundant, women, of course, doing the bulk, if not all of the hard work, children from the age of seven or eight years aiding them. On the mountain range to the east of the railroad facing the Bulgarian side, one sees long rows of crude brush defenses, where the same old classes of soldiers are on duty.

School children there are, but one sees only a few of them and these are on their way to the elementary schools. At the cafes one pays five cents (25 paras) for a slice of bread, and mighty thin too at that. This is for white bread, which is extremely scarce and considered a delicacy. Most of the people are happy to obtain black bread made out of bran, salt and sand, and forming a large part of this mixture and giving them reason to believe they possess plenty of grit. This black bread sells for twelve cents a loaf where formerly it sold for four. Meat is very high, but it is good what you get of it, as it must be fresh killed, no means of refrigerating being at hand. The high price of bread and meat has caused the people to come to believe in vegetarianism. There is plenty of vegetable food, which may be obtained at reasonable rates. I heard of a case of a woman, a widow on a farm not far from Belgrade, who had overdone this vegetarian diet. With her two children she had lived on peppers, alternating, however, between the red and the green for so long a time that when a doctor from the American hospital found the whole family sick, he said it was a plain case of pepperitis, the only name he could give.

I started out from Nish on August 14 at 8 p. m. with a companion named Duce Peters, one of my colleagues. The three hundred-mile journey from Nish to Belgrade brought us through beautiful mountainous country. The railroad is a remarkable achievement, by Italian engineers, boring its way through the mountains. The last journey brings you through a full valley where one finds the intensive cultivation of the soil in Serbia. As you approach Belgrade the mountains become lower but more fertile. It is here that you go through the forests of the king, where King Peter hunts deer. Now one sees on a crest of every hill an old fort ready for business.

Wgot off at the temporary station at 9:30 that morning. The ordinary road to Belgrade is very long, so in order to make a short cut to the city proper, we went over a mountain path. It proved a steep hot climb, but from the crest of this mountain we got a magnificent view of both Serbian and Austrian battle fronts. We were close to the Austrian positions on the east bank of the Sava. In fact, we were in easy range of the sharpshooters, but did not know it at the time. There were many signs of this we found later.

NISH, ordinarily a city of 20,000 population, now has over 60,000. So many people flocked here at the time of the invasion and since made it their permanent residence, that the government issued an order that by October 1 all persons not engaged in governmental work must leave the city. A prominent resident of Nish offered a hundred dinars ($17) to anyone who would show him a vacant room in the city.

One sees hundreds of Austrian prisoners. They have complete liberty about the city, and only occasionally one hears them grumbling. Very many of them are of Slavic descent, speak the Serbian language and are more loyal to King Peter than to Franz Joseph. In fact, some of them told me that in the time of the invasion they really threw down their arms, realizing that they were fighting brothers.

Armenia Again Under Persecution

MADE skeptical by horror reports from the scenes of war in Europe, which have turned out to be greatly overdrawn—though often including short of the terrible facts—the American churches have been cautious in accepting at their face value tales of new Turkish atrocities in Armenia. It seems incredible in view of the former persecutions of the Armenian Christians and the consequent stern disfavor abroad throughout the civilized world, that the Turk had again plunged his sword into that subject people.

By the various Mission Boards in this country, and authorities at Washington, now know that almost unparalleled suffering is being inflicted upon hundreds of thousands of Armenians in Turkey. They know that, taking courage on the bloody example set by Christian countries who are at each other's throats, the Mohammedan has dared again to attempt to exterminate one branch of the Christian Church.

A most careful and extensive investigation of the evidence in this new indictment of Turkey has been in progress by a committee consisting of Charles R. Crai, Samuel T. Dutton, Cleveland H. Doe, Arthur C. James, Stephen S. Wis, Frank Mason North, John R. Mo, Stanley White, H. G. Benneyan, Jan L. Barton, William Sloane, William L. Haven, Frederick Lynch and other men of eminence representing various American interests in the Turkish empire. This committee has gone thoroughly into the mass of statements which have come from many sources of unquestioned veracity and authority and they have found most terribly against the Turkish people.

As early as last April it was perceived that the movement against the Armenians was part of a concerted movement against non-Turkish and Muslim and progressive elements, including the Zionists. Persecution, plunder and massacre were taking place in the interior parts of the country, often with incredible severity. The scattering of its population was a part of the design.

July, as reports from widely scattered regions at that time indicated, that there were systematic arrests, terrible tortures, wholesale deportations from one end of the empire to the other, accompanied by things far worse than death. The fearful onslaught upon the peaceful population was directed from Constantinople. It was apparent that a campaign of race extermination was in progress. The Ottoman government was deaf to every voice raised in behalf of Armenia.

Any officers were under orders to act on their discretion "in case of military necessity, and in case they suspect espionage or treason" to remove the inhabitants of whole towns and other places at will. The execution of such orders has given opportunity for horrible brutality to women, children, the sick and the aged. On an hour's notice the villages have been deported in great haste as even to leave little children behind. Men were bound together, women and children were driven under the whip. No outrage possible under such circumstances was omitted.

One refugee whose testimony is accepted, relates how the deportation proclamation was posted in the streets, followed speedily by soldiers with fixed bayonets who drove the Armenians from their homes into companies of hundreds and forced them—those that survived to the end—into a miserable exile. "The weeping and wailing of the women and children was most heart-rending. Some of these people were from wealthy and refined circles. There were clergymen, merchants, bankers, mechanics and men from every walk of life." Individuals who for one reason and another "became so weak that they fell behind, were bayoneted and thrown into the river."

So the accounts proceed. "Clubbed and beaten and lashed along as though they had been wild animals," the victims of the uncontrolled passions of ruffian guards called soldiers, these great companies of our fellow men and women fled before the unspeakable Turk.

The report of the committee does not give estimates of the numbers who are suffering in this new persecution. Press reports state that upwards of 500,000 and even more are under lash and torture. The likelihood that from the viewpoint of the Turk individuals here and there, and even organizations here and there, of Armenians have been active in engendering antagonism to Turkish rule, cannot for a moment lessen the horrid guilt of Turkey. In a notable address at the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church on the night of October 1 before a large audience representative of all the Protestant bodies, Rev. Samuel M. Zwemer, the recognized authority on the Moslem world, declared that the fact of the Armenian atrocities on an enormous scale was beyond doubt. The situation is one that must stir the Christian Church to action. It does not seem possible that the Christian governments of the world will permit Turkey to go untried at the bar of civilization, and if proven guilty to go unpunished.

ARMENIA lies in the northeastern corner of Asia Minor between the Black Sea and the Caspian, the Caucasus Mountains at the north. In that small spot probably a million Armenians struggle to maintain a sort of national existence. Outside of Armenia proper there may be another million. Scattered amongst them in Armenia are Kurds, Turks, Jews and others.

That the Armenians are a wholly inoffensive and lovable race is not alleged, for there are turbulent spirits and untamed natures among them. But as a people they are indoctrinated with the Christian religion, and for the most part live peaceable and industrious lives. The Armenian Church is ancient. Its theology differs from the other Eastern churches and from our American bodies. But because they are a branch of the Christian Church, the Armenians have received the impact of Mohammedan hatred which again and again has broken out in ungoverned persecution.

Young People's Topics for October 24

The Call of Missions for Men and Money

Epworth League Topic. May 24-29

TO the writer's desk the other day came a letter from a former student, a successful and busy physician, in which occur these words: "Chances are very many to one that I shall soon want to take up missionary work from a surgical standpoint. It does not really much matter where a fellow works in this world, just so he is busy and is doing something. Fields where the work is thickest is the place to be considered—any place from 'Greenland's icy mountains to India's coral strands.'"

"Where the work is thickest"—that is the lure today. Many another young business or professional man and thousands of students are feeling that pull of the pagan world, and are eager to go, with the light and help of the Gospel, to relieve its bitter need.

Beginning this month, a great crusade is to be conducted by the Laymen's Missionary Movement, which will touch all centers of the United States, culminating in a great rally at Washington in April. Multitudes of men will hear the claims of missions upon their conscience, their feet and their purses. Many will go; many will give royally. All will have their vision sharpened, their passion stirred to help win the world for Christ.

A recent Christian Herald editorial stated: "The useless war, which has already killed off millions of men and decided nothing, is being kept up at a cost of $35,000,000 a day. This equals the united annual resources of all the Foreign Mission Boards of the world." Think of that; $35,000,000 a day to kill and maim; $100,000 to bless and save. Almost a million dollars and a half every hour for destruction; less than five thousand for salvation.

And this at a time of greater opportunities, more amazingly rapid, more stupendous victories for the cross than the world has ever seen. Thousands in India clamoring for baptism and admission to Christian churches, for whom no pastors and teachers are available. A great evangelistic campaign under way in Japan. And in China—well, in the first place, think of the official band of the governor of Hunan Province, called "the most bigoted province of China," playing "God Be With You Till We Meet Again" at a meeting of three thousand students, admitted by ticket to an evangelistic service conducted by Sherwood Eddy, the American Bible apostle! Another letter tells of three thousand men sitting in the rain—and Chinamen do not like to go out in the rain with their silk garments and cloth shoes—listening to Mr. Eddy as he spoke against dishonesty, gambling, impurity, the besetting sins of Chinese cities. Rain poured through the mat shed, but the men sat and listened; the next night four thousand came—and twelve hundred gave their names as desiring to join Bible classes. In Peking alone one thousand nine hundred new members were added to the twelve Christian churches. In the single city of Hingwa and to the workers of the Methodist denomination alone have come eleven thousand inquirers within a year.

President Yuan Shi Kai himself received the Bible workers; the vice-president of the Republic gave them a luncheon. Mr. Eddy, in a letter written from China to his brother, goes on to show the co-operation of the officials of the republic:

"The Ministry of the Interior at their own suggestion granted us a site for a pavilion for the evangelistic meetings within the Forbidden City itself.

"While the Ministry of the Interior gave us the site, the Ministry of War granted two hundred tents from the army to make the pavilion rain proof. The Minister of Education granted a half holiday to all the government students in Peking to enable them to attend the opening meeting. The Minister of Foreign Affairs sent his representative to the meeting in person.

"On the opening day four thousand students crowded the hall and listened with earnest attention.

"More than a thousand men signed cards as inquirers to join Bible classes from more than a score of colleges in the city. The next day at a meeting of 1,500 schoolboys some five hundred more indicated their desire to join Bible classes. A meeting was also held in another part of the city attended by 1,700 of the gentry and business men, and the Board of Trade asked for three hundred reserved seats at this meeting. Three hundred and fifty of these men indicated their desire to join Bible classes.

"In all more than two thousand inquirers expressed their desire to study the Bible in classes. The response of the officials and leaders of China was most notable here in the capital city, which has long been the most conservative center of China.

"At one meeting held for inquirers who were deemed near the point of decision for the Christian life I recognized one former governor, two generals, a private secretary to the President, the director of China's national bank, prominent officials, a young non-Christian philanthropist who has given this year $12,000 to Christian work, who is providing free education for several students and distributing the Bible to hundreds in the capital.

"Probably in no other country in the world today are the officials so accessible to Christianity as in China.

"I am writing on the train as we are speeding on our way to distant Hunan, where we are expecting an even greater response to the Gospel in a province for which Pitkin and I used often to pray together, which contained at that time not a single missionary or Christian worker. Truly the days of miracles have not passed, and we shall see 'greater things than these.'"

The following incident, retold by Mr. and Mrs. Jenness in the Epworth League Topic Notes, illustrates graphically the willingness of the Chinese officials to assist the gospel work.

An amusing and significant incident occurred at Amoy, Fukien Province. Pending Eddy's arrival, the man in charge of local preparations, Rev. A. L. Warnshuis, racked his brain to think of some way of approaching the tao-tai (lieutenant-governor of the province) to secure his endorsement of the meetings. The tao-tai was a man of tremendous influence. The six million people of his southern section of the province venerated his word as gospel. His endorsement would spell success for the campaign in Amoy.

While Warnshuis was debating and fretting, the remarkable happened (as usual), and the tao-tai himself came to the missionary.

"I have heard of your intended meetings," he said. "They are just what Amoy needs. What can I do to help?"

Warnshuis caught his breath and summoned all his wits. He replied, with some hesitation.

"We need a good site for the tabernacle."

"That shall be arranged at once," replied the tao-tai, and he promised a site in the very heart of the town in the most advantageous position.

"Is there anything else I can do?"

Then Warnshuis made a request that would quite probably have cost his head if the year had been 1900 instead of 1914.

"It would help greatly," he suggested, "if you should issue an official proclamation announcing the meetings and circulate it throughout the province!"

"Gladly!" returned the official. And thus the overlord of six million people became publicity agent for a Christian preacher! "What else?"

Mr. Warnshuis thought, "I am sure Mr. Eddy would appreciate it," he said, "if you would take the chair at the first meeting."

"I should like nothing better. What else?"

Finally the missionary threw up his hands in despair.

"You've beat me!" he confessed. "You are willing to do more things than I feel I can ask."

"Courage, Christian"

COURAGE, Christian, do not falter,
If thy way seems lone or dark;
Christ in spirit will sustain thee,
Sheltered safe within the Ark.

The Shekinah of his presence
Light and life—thy way attend;
And Jehovah will be with thee;
Angel guards thy life defend.

Trust ye in the Lord forever
And his strength thy strength shall be,
And the peace that passeth knowledge
Shall through storm abide with thee.

A GREAT SPIRITUAL UPLIFT

The daily readings and prayer in the Christian Herald have been a wonderful spiritual uplift to me. I have looked forward to them each morning with a longing to know what good thing the morning lesson would bring. Many times when I have been discouraged or despondent, the selection and little sermonette would just fit my need.

A DETERMINED WOMAN

Finally Found a Food that Helped Her

"When I first read of the remarkable effects of Grape-Nuts food, I determined to secure some," says a Mother. "At that time there was none kept in town, but my husband ordered from a Chicago traveler.

"I had been greatly afflicted with sudden attacks of cramps, nausea, and vomiting. Tried all sorts of remedies and physicians, but obtained only temporary relief. As soon as I began to use Grape-Nuts the cramps disappeared and never returned.

"My old attacks of sick stomach a little slower to yield, but by continuing the food, that trouble has disappeared. I am today perfectly well, eat anything and everything I wish, without paying the penalty that I used to. We would not keep house without Grape-Nuts.

"My husband was so delighted with the benefits I received that he has been recommending Grape-Nuts to his customers and has built up a very large trade on the food. He sells it to many of the leading physicians of the city, who recommend Grape-Nuts very generally. There is some satisfaction in using a really scientifically prepared food."

Why This Car Has Outsold Anything of Its Size Ever Designed

Practically every feature of the car had been tested and proved in thousands upon thousands of Overlands which preceded it.

There was the experience to warrant larger production.

There was the reputation to assure larger sales.

This justified a production program calling for 75,000 cars—twice as many as had ever been built of any car so big as this.

Such enormous production and probable sales determined the price—$750.

The record value established by so low a price resulted in the greatest demand ever known for so big a car.

Sales have run constantly ahead even of the enormous production.

The car is the ideal family size—it carries five passengers in roomy comfort.

It has the same powerful, economical 35 horse-power motor which made previous Overlands famous.

But as this is a lighter car there is even more reserve power.

It has that certainty of ignition provided only by high tension magneto.

It has the comfort provided by long underslung rear springs and four-inch tires.

It has convenience of electrical control—switches are on the steering column. This arrangement is found only on the Overland and a few very much higher priced cars.

It has a full streamline body and a beautiful finish—you will have justifiable pride in its appearance.

Sales have forced a production even larger than originally planned.

Production is increasing steadily.

SOMETIMES the liking for Kellogg's Toasted Corn Flakes shows itself very early in life. And the littlest member of the household is the most clamorous of demand!

It's a grand way to get youngsters to take plenty of good top milk. And the tender golden flakes have just the crisp consistency for little teeth to crunch.

Then too there is the WAXTITE package that keeps the fresh, good flavor in—and all other flavors out.

When mother says "Corn Flakes" she means Kellogg's—and not one of the three hundred or more imitations and substitutes.

Baby knows the difference at once—simply refusing to eat flakes that are tasteless and tough.

Remember, please, that you don't know Corn Flakes unless you know Kellogg's—the original Toasted Corn Flakes—their goodness insured by our responsibility to over a million homes.

The Cloistered Basilica of "The Church of St. Paul Without the Walls"

ROME, the "Eternal City," now in the full panoply of a great world-war, saw the conclusion of Paul's long and arduous career. In the homily of Chrysostom, the golden-tongued, on the Epistle to the Romans is this interesting passage:

"I honor Rome for this reason: for though I could celebrate her praises on many other accounts; for her greatness, for her beauty, for her power, for her wealth, and for her warlike exploits, yet passing over all these things, I glorify her on this account, that St. Paul in his lifetime wrote to the Romans, and loved them, and was present and conversed with them, and ended his life among them. Wherefore the city is on this account renowned more than all others; on this account I admire her: not on account of her gold, her columns, or her other splendid decorations."

Every Christian traveler can re-echo the great preacher's words, and I am very sure my readers will not be wearied if we visit together the spots made forever memorable by the last days and hours of the greatest of Christians.

Indeed, it may be said that every walk in Rome is a reminder of St. Paul and his mission. Of the four hundred churches in the city, many contain pictures and statues of the apostle, and all are reminders of the apostle's Master and of the faith which the disciple came to Rome to proclaim. And not only in the

Where Paul Finished His Course

By REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

"I have finished the course; I have kept the faith."

churches and numberless shrines and altars do we see reminders of Paul's influence, but every picture-shop and art gallery contain representations of the sacred scenes which his life was devoted to explaining and enforcing.

When the apostle entered the city through the Capuan Gate, chained to his guard, no one of these churches was dreamed of; no artist had conceived such a picture as the most modest one of all the tens of thousands which now adorn the walls of the churches, or hang in the priceless art galleries. No sculptor had then thought of chiseling the features of the Son of Man, or of any of his followers. Christian art had not been born, and the treasures which chiefly make Rome famous were not simply unknown, they were unimagined. Paul and those who followed him brought not only a new religion but a new art, a new poetry, a new prose literature, to Rome and to the world.

BUT before we visit these sacred places connected with the last scenes in the life of the apostle, it may be well to ask, Do we really know where Paul was imprisoned and beheaded and buried?

I cannot reply that there is absolute certainty, but, in spite of doubt thrown by critics and skeptics on all these places, there is a reasonable probability that they have been correctly identified. It is at least certain that for centuries and centuries pious souls have here come to renew their faith and zeal and courage, and this of itself would hallow them.

But, beyond the hopes and wishes of the devout in regard to the place of the martyrdom and burial of the apostle, the researches of careful antiquarian scholars give us confidence to believe that we know the very spots made sacred by St. Paul's last moments and last resting-place.

The distinguished author and archeologist, Rodolfo Lanciani, who has written many books about Rome and her ancient treasures, says: "For the archeologist the presence and execution of St. Peter and St. Paul in Rome are facts established beyond the shadow of doubt by purely monumental evidence"; and then he quotes a long list of authorities, ancient and modern, to substantiate his views.

He tells us, too, that on December 1, 1891, he had the privilege of examining the actual grave of the apostle, under the great cellar of the Church of St. Paul without the Walls, and found there his tombstone with the inscription "PAOLO APOSTOLO MART" (Paul, Apostle, Martyr), an inscription belonging to the fourth century.

Museum on the Site of the Ancient Roman Hot Baths

Mamertine Prison at Left Which May Have Held St. Paul

It will perhaps surprise my readers to hear him say also, "There is no doubt that the likenesses of St. Peter and St. Paul have been carefully preserved in Rome ever since their lifetime, and that they were familiar to every one, even to school children. These portraits have come down to us by scores. They are painted in the cubiculi of the catacombs, engraved in gold-leaf in the so-called vetri cimiteriali, cast in bronze, hammered in silver or copper, and designed in mosaic. The type never varies; St. Peter's face is full and strong, with short curly hair and beard, while St. Paul appears more wiry and thin, slightly bald, with long, pointed beard."

With these historical confirmations of our faith in mind, let us visit the places of St. Paul's imprisonment, and those of his death and burial.

ON his first trial Paul was doubtless acquitted, and allowed to go free. The best authorities believe that two or three years elapsed between the first and second trials, and that in the meantime he traveled as far as Spain, proclaiming the Gospel of his beloved Master. On his return he was again thrown into prison, and again tried. This time, owing perhaps to the fact that the Jewess Poppæa had usurped the place of the gentle Octavia in the affections of Nero, and had caused Nero to murder his former wife, or perhaps because, with other Christians, Paul had been accused by the bestial emperor of his own crime in setting fire to Rome, Paul did not escape the fury of the emperor and the Jews.

The reputed place of Paul's long imprisonment, the Forum, is the center of the noblest ruins of Rome. Not far from the center of the busy, noisy, modern city rise the scarred ruins of her ancient glory. Here is the temple of Saturn with its eight columns, the often copied three columns of the temple of Castor and Pollux, the Arch of Septimius Severus, the temples of Vesta and Cæsar, and many other famous ruins; and beyond are the palaces of the Cæsars. Not far away is the magnificent Column of Trajan, 147 feet in height, around which run reliefs of the emperor's wars, containing, it is said, over 2,500 sculptured human figures.

Close to the entrance to the Forum, this most wonderful collection of the ruined monuments of ancient times, is a small church called the Church of Saint Giuseppe dei Falegnami. Under this church are two dungeons, an upper and a lower, called the Mamertine Prison, and from a hole in the upper chamber prisoners were lowered into the noisome hole below, sometimes to perish miserably of starvation, as did Jugurtha, king of Mauritania, with whom schoolboys become so familiar in their first year of Latin.

In this dungeon—uncounted thousands of Christians believe—St. Paul and St. Peter were immured, and every year on the night of the fourth of July representatives of all the churches of Rome assemble by torchlight and "in solemn silence kneel in front of the traditional pillar." A strange Fourth of July celebration, indeed, as we think of the snapping firecrackers, and booming cannon, and clanging bells, which, in our own land, usher in the Fourth of July.

While it is thought by many that the apostles could not have been imprisoned in the dungeon of Jugurtha, it is supposed that there may have been other underground caverns connected with this one, in which the apostles were immured in their final and most bitter imprisonment. At any rate, as by light of modern electric bulbs we make our way through this dismal dungeon, we can realize something of what imprisonment meant in the time of Nero, and something of what the great apostle doubtless suffered just before his execution.

Another walk will take us to the place of martyrdom and to the place of the burial of the apostle. To these two places we must pay a reverent visit.

STARTING from the mighty Coliseum, the grim reminder of other martyrs who were here thrown to the wild beasts, we pass under the Arch of Constantine, and out through a broad highway lined on either side with little but ruins, until we come to an ancient gate now called the Porta San Paolo (The Gate of St. Paul). A wonderfully well preserved tomb in the shape of an Egyptian pyramid stands just outside the gateway. This was the tomb of Caius Cestius, a Roman noble, who died twelve years before the beginning of the Christian era.

As he went out through this gateway to his martyrdom, Paul's eyes must have rested upon this monument, which is as unscathed and clear-cut to-day as it was two thousand years ago. Soon we pass a little church on the left-hand side of the road, on which we read the following inscription in Latin, underneath an interesting sculpture of the two apostles:

Paul said to Peter, Peace be with thee, Foundation of the Church, Shepherd of the flock of Christ. And Peter said to Paul, Go in peace, Preacher of Good Tidings, and Giver of the Salvation of the Just.

This is the traditional spot where the two founders of the church are said to have met for the last time, Paul on his way to martyrdom, and returning to the city, where, long afterward, it is said to have suffered for the Faith.

Nearly a mile beyond this little church, in a beautiful tree-embowered nook far away from the road and dust of the city, is the Church of the Three Fountains (S. Paolo alle Tre Fontane). In St. Paul's time this was doubtless a much more populous region than it is now, for the great Ostian Way to the sea-shore passed near by. But now Ostia is deserted and the road is largely frequented by pious pilgrims who are seeking the place of St. Paul's martyrdom. Here, it is said, he met his death; and while we cannot believe in the pillar to which he is said to have been bound, while the story of the three fountains which gush at the three places struck by the martyr's head, he was decapitated seems puerile enough, yet nevertheless a beautiful, quiet spot, well fitted for the site of the tradition, which has persisted almost from the beginning, that here the great apostle died.

Half way between the Church of the Three Fountains and the city wall is one of the most magnificent churches of this land of glorious cathedrals, the Church of S. Paolo Fuori le Mura (St. Paul without the walls); for here, it is said, rest the ashes of the great apostle.

I know of no more imposing basilica in all the world. In many respects it surpasses St. Peter's in its impressiveness. The eighty mighty Corinthian monoliths of polished granite which uphold the roof were gifts of the Catholic sovereigns of Europe, and, as has been well and poetically said, are "reflected as in a mirror of glass in the floor of the nave and aisles."

Here, in this magnificent cathedral, built by emperors and princes to do him honor, with his beloved disciple Timothy by his side, rest the remains of the great maker of Tarsus, whom we have followed from his boyhood's home through many wanderings in Greece, and Asia Minor, and Syria, and Europe, until now we bid him farewell in this church forever dedicated to his memory. No tomb, however glorious, can do him too much honor; but we can imagine that beyond all human praise he would desire to have inscribed in his sepulcher the words:

"For me to live is Christ; to die is gain."

Why Are Protestant Missions in Latin America?

By FRANK L. BROWN, Joint General Superintendent of the World's Sunday School Association

THIS question has come under fresh discussion in the public press through the attitude of a section of an important church in opposing delegated relationship in the Panama Congress of February, 1916, which congress shall deal with Protestant missions in Latin America.

While the church referred to maintains work in Catholic Latin-American countries, the purpose is chiefly to provide for the church membership which may locate in these fields and do mission work among the unevangelized native tribes, such as the Moros of the Philippines. At Sao Paulo, Brazil, however, the work of the Protestant Episcopal Church is among the native as well as the foreign population. This work, Bishop Every says, "is justified on the ground that a young state in the new world, with all its life in front, should not have to choose between a corrupt Catholicism and Protestant nonconformity, but should have the alternative presented to it of what we regard as true Scriptural Catholicism."

Just why Protestant missions are in Catholic countries when there are so many millions of what are popularly termed "heathen" yet to be reached in countries like India and China, is a question requiring a satisfactory answer. And that answer is not hard to find.

For four hundred years the Catholic Church has been in full control of the personal, political and educational life of Latin America. The conditions obtaining in every one of these fields after these years are such that a new force is needed to morally and spiritually vitalize these countries and arrest the decay.

The type of Catholicism in Latin America is very different from that prevailing in North America, outside of Mexico. There is, of course, much of true devotion, particularly on the part of the women; but the general conditions are admittedly so bad that the Protestant Church has an undoubted mission in feeding the spiritual needs of the people and in assisting any and without the Catholic Church who are striving to bring in a better day.

Large parts of the population of South America particularly, are non-Catholic and agnostic. There are ten millions of Indians who have been practically unreached by the Gospel message. There is a large immigration into the fertile areas of Brazil and Argentina. Many of these immigrants are Protestant. In one province of Southern Brazil there are 300,000 German who have colonized a district selected by a commission of the German government. These are mainly Protestant. Southern Chile is heavily German. Nearly half of the 300,000 population of Sao Paulo in Southern Brazil are immigrants, chiefly Italians. In the city of Lima, Peru, 20,000 Chinese are living. Argentina is as cosmopolitan as New York. Following this view

A New Day for Mesopotamia

What the War Means in the Ultimate Breaking Up of Islam

By REV. SAMUEL M. ZWEMER, D.D., F.R.G.S., OF ARABIA AND EGYPT

HISTORY is being made in the Persian Gulf, and the dawn of liberty has come to the old land of Mesopotamia. Even as the bombardment at Manila Bay signified not doom but dawn for the Philippine Islands, and a day of opportunity and gospel privilege for its benighted peoples, so the Battle of Busrah and the occupation of the regions beyond signify the doom of the Turk at the beginning of a new day for a region of the world which, beyond all others, should interest Christians.

What changes history has made in the great alluvial plains of the rivers Euphrates and Tigris! The splendor of the past can hardly be credited because of the ruin of the present. Everywhere the traveler might see traces of ancient empire, and yet the story seems a dream, as one watches half-naked Arabs passing through mud-banks, with their wild cattle and primitive implements.

Regions once populous were ruined by the misrule of the Turk, and by the tribal warfare and stagnation that follow in the wake of Islam.

On the last day of January, Sir Percy Cox, the chief political officer of the Persian Gulf, accompanied by the Viceroy of India, Lord Hardy, who represented King George, the Emperor of India, landed at Kuwait, and invested the ruling Arab chief with the order of Knight Commander of the Star of India. Afterward he visited the mission hospital and spoke frank words of appreciation at what Americans were accomplishing, through the ministry of healing, in winning the hearts of the Arabs.

The Holy War, proclaimed by Turkey at the instigation of Germany, was not a success in Arabia. Bore the present European struggle, the Arabs had already grown weary of Turkish rule, and had turned out the Turkish garrisons, bag and baggage, from the province of Hassa. At Katif, the chief port of that province, the Turkish flag has been hauled down forever.

When the British expedition occupied Busrah, the Arabian mission hospital changed its registry to the wounded under the Red Crescent and did the same work under the Red Cross. Side by side were wounded from both camps receiving aid from missionaries.

On July 24 was fought the battle of Nasiriyeh, near the village which occupies the site where Abraham once played as a boy, the true "Ur of the Chaldees." How strange is the record when we think back through the centuries; first, Abraham, the father of the faithful, and then after many centuries, the conquest of Islam; and now a battle which may decide the destiny of all this region for the future.

"Our job is finished," wrote an officer in his diary on July 31. "We captured all the enemy's guns—14 in number—obtaining a 30-pounder, some 350 prisoners, including a colonel, and any amount of gun and rifle ammunition stores, etc., a really good knock."

Dr. Samuel M. Zwemer, D.D.

ward. It will be true of Bagdad when that city falls into the hands of Great Britain:

"Kuwait is now a British protectorate, with all the privileges of a dependency of the British Empire, among which is penny postage to any part of the Empire and halfpenny postage to any part of India, such as Aden, Burmah, Siam, and the Arabian shore of the Persian Gulf and up the Shat-el-Arab to Busrah. It is probable that the Turk will no longer have dominion in our part of Arabia, and with his departure disappears one more obstacle to Christian mission work. Kuwait no longer flies the Crescent and Star, but a plain red flag with the word 'Kuwait' worked upon it in Arabic in white letters. The waning crescent of Islam sheds but little light in this country; all is darkness, gross darkness: May the Sun of Righteousness, with healing in his wings, soon rise, never again to set."

WHEN the psalmist describes the blessings that are to come to the Arabian peninsula, in the Seventy-second Psalm, he gives the very boundaries of Arabia, and indicates what economic and social and moral changes will take place when "Christ shall have dominion from sea to sea and from the Euphrates to the ends of the earth."

The country has numerous agricultural possibilities, and, under a decent government, could support ten times the present population. Mesopotamia is rich not only in date crops but in cereals, wool, gums, licorice root and other products. As an oil country its riches have only recently been discovered and tapped. At Mohammerah, half way between Busrah and the mouth of the river, the Anglo-Persian Oil Company has already built its works, and one would imagine it was a suburb of Pittsburg, or Oil City, rather than the beginning of an enterprise in Northwest Arabia. The stimulus of progress will do much.

The British Government, once in possession of this territory, will deliver its population from deceit and violence. Tribal warfare will doubtless be a thing of the past, and, even as in India, a secure government will yield abundant opportunity for economic development and offer to missions an open door for social uplift and spiritual emancipation.

With all the horrors of this war which prevail in Europe and its awful massacres in Turkey, we may yet rejoice that on the outskirts of what was once the Turkish Empire, much good has already resulted. God has made the wrath of men to praise him, and the morning light is breaking in Northwest Arabia. How different it will be when British common law displaces the medieval code of Islam with all its cruelty, when the apostate from the religion of Mohammed no longer is in danger of his life, when the village children shall have school privileges, and when the mission schools shall become colleges for the training of a future leadership for all this country!

The Venice of the East. A Landing Place at Bosara

DR. C. STANLEY G. MILRAY, one of our missionaries at Kuwait, interprets the present situation as follows; and what he says of Kuwait is equally true of Busrah and of all the region north-

WHITE HOUSE TO BE GRACED BY BEAUTIFUL "FIRST LADY OF THE LAND." On October 6, President Wilson announced through Secretary Tumulty his engagement to Mrs. Norman Galt, a beautiful and popular member of Washington society and a daughter of the South. The date of the wedding has not been fixed, but the event is expected to take place in December. The President and his fiancée visited New York a few days later to select the engagement ring and make preparations for the wedding. Only a few intimate friends were in the great secret, and the announcement surprised not only official Washington, but all the nation. This romance of the White House has been proceeding for a year and has ripened into what all observers say is a most happy situation. Mrs. Galt's maiden name was Edith Bolling, her family being numbered among the oldest and most prominent of the South. The story is current that descent from Pocahontas, the Indian heroine who became a Christian in 1614 and married the Englishman John Rolfe, is claimed for Mrs. Galt. The Bolling family is of far back English origin and there are no complete records by which to trace this interesting story on the basis of which a resemblance between the President's fiancée and the daughter of Powhatan is claimed. Indian names, it is stated, are numerous through all the family history. President Wilson himself is a native of Virginia and of English ancestry. Mrs. Galt is a member of the Episcopal Church, and the President is a Presbyterian. It is thought that for the very brief honeymoon which the affairs of state will permit, the President and the new First Lady of the Land will visit the Panama-Pacific and San Diego Expositions.

MAINE GOES IN FOR AUTOS. A rivalry seems to be springing up among the states for numerical lead in the matter of automobile licenses taken out each year. Maine records 24,326 operators, and an approximate expenditure for cars of $6,515,000, in the last year.

A STREAM THAT KEEPS WITHIN ITS BANKS. Gold has been "flowing" into the United States since January 1, according to the Federal Reserve Board, to the amount of $252,895,000 up to September 17, of which $154,899,000 was in American coin.

THE HEAVENS A MERE PLAYGROUND. A professional aviator, Arthur Smith of Indiana, on the night of October 8 performed the highly useful feat of looping the loop sixteen times at an altitude of three thousand feet over the Hudson River, in an aeroplane, which he built himself, blazing with fireworks. The aviator states that he has been invited to join the Russian and French aviation corps, but prefers to remain a member of the "reserve aviation corps of the United States." Such a plucky and skillful rider of the air should be able to perfect some very baffling signals with which to confuse an enemy.

FAME'S WAITING LIST. Men and women whose fame lasts at least ten years after their death, are eligible to be declared permanently famous by representative men who once every five years act as electors for the New York University Hall of Fame. The list is a long one and most of the names on it are already hung in the Public's hall of fame. However, the electors have now chosen seven from the list to be added to the forty-seven previously enscrolled in the University: Mark Hopkins, educator, Massachusetts; Francis Parkman, historian, Massachusetts; Elias Howe, inventor, Massachusetts; Joseph Henry, scientist, New York; Charlotte Cushman, actress, Massachusetts (the first of that profession to be admitted); Rufus Choate, orator, Massachusetts; Daniel Boone, pioneer, Pennsylvania, whose election will be approved by all boys. Patrick Henry, "Stonewall" Jackson, "Phil" Sheridan, Horace Greeley, Noah Webster, Dwight L. Moody, Miles Standish, "Davy" Crockett, James G. Blaine, William McKinley, John Hay, John Jacob Astor, Joseph Jefferson and scores more must still remain on the waiting list.

CHICAGO TO LAY BY $300,000 ON THE FIRST DAY OF THE WEEK. "Whoever keeps open any tipping house or place where liquor is sold or given away upon the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, shall be fined not exceeding $200," says the Illinois law, and William Hale Thompson, mayor of Chicago, has ordered all Chicago saloons to comply forthwith. The order went into effect October 10, to the hearty disgust of a small army of bibbers who, it is estimated, have been spending around $300,000 every Sunday for drink. For the first time in over forty years, it is said, the city will witness a dry Sunday, and the seven thousand and more saloons will be for that day free advertisements of the anti-saloon forces.

MOST OF US ARE STILL TO DISCOVER THE OLD STANDBYS. The average man would be hard put to it to point out to his little son all the visible planets, and name them. Professor Sola, director of the observatory at Barcelona University, Spain, announced on October 6 that on September 15 he discovered a new planet in the Pisces constellation. Astronomers are waiting for additional data. The new speck in the sky may turn out to be one of the several hundred very small bodies whose existence is understood but which have not yet been individually located.

AMERICAN GETS TANGLED UP IN THE WAR. A former Princeton student, Gustav Kenneth Wood Triest, nineteen years old, joined the British navy last January without the knowledge of his family, who did not know of his whereabouts, and is now a prisoner in the Tower of London, accused of being a German spy. His father, a merchant of New York City, after exhausting all other methods to help his son, who would be executed if convicted, finally secured the friendly intervention of the State Department at Washington on the ground that the young man is eccentric and not always responsible for his actions, and the trial, which was to have taken place October 4, was postponed until October 18.

WOULD CREATE MILITARY RESERVE. The estimates for the army budget which are submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury long in advance of the assembling of Congress, this year include proposed appropriations for carrying out plans submitted by Secretary of War Garrison which will greatly increase the military strength of the country, adding 20,000 men to the standing army, reorganizing the militia and creating a reserve, besides adding to the field artillery and calling for an extension of the Plattsburg training camp idea.

SPEAKING OF FAME . . . Elsewhere we mention the Hall of Fame. At Indianapolis, October 7, James Whitcomb Riley (who cannot get into the Hall until he has been dead ten years) was feted by thousands in honor of his birthday—the sixty-second it is said, though the poet won't confirm it—and from all over the United States and from abroad messages of affection and esteem poured in on him. The city had been planning the festivities for some time, and eminent visitors were present from many outside points to take part. President Wilson was among those who sent telegraphic congratulations. The schools throughout the state devoted a period to exercises in the poet's honor. At the great banquet tendered him in the evening Riley was called the poet laureate of America, but the title of Hoosier Poet will remain.

LIVE WEATHER VANES POINT TO COLD WINTER. Augustin Rey, a naturalist and meteorologist of France, has advised his government that all signs indicate a long and cold Winter, comparable only to that of 1870-71. Besides early snows in the Alps even in low altitudes, the scientist has noticed that heather blossoms have contracted at the base of the stem; trees began to lose their leaves in August; field mice began to burrow into Winter quarters that same month instead of waiting until September, their usual moving time; and birds commenced to migrate in advance of the ordinary season. (In a recent news note in the Christian Herald, a naturalist was quoted as stating that climatic conditions had little or nothing to do with bird migrations.) We shall be glad to learn what the signs are in this country for the coming Winter.

FIVE HUNDRED STORIES HIGH, AND NO ELEVATORS. Dr. Andrew J. Gilmour of the Manhattan State Hospital has just returned to New York with the report of his ascent of Mount Geikie near Alberta, British Columbia, which he made on August 5 in company with Professor Holway of the University of Minnesota. They started from their base at four o'clock in the morning by moonlight and reached the summit, 11,016 feet, at 10.30, making the last 5,000 feet up an almost continuous precipice of ice, in which they had to cut over 300 steps and handholds. Mount Geikie has been shunned by mountain-climbers because of its precipitous sides, its glaciers and its distance from civilization, but it has yielded at last, as have other better known peaks, to the courage and daring of Americans.

WAR COSTS MOUNT ALMOST BY GEOMETRIC PROGRESSION. In an analysis of the Himalayan cost of war the New York Evening Post finds that the initial cost is for equipment and supplies for the original fighting strength, plus pay to the men. Then comes the huge new enlistment, plus equipment and supplies. Then redoubled fortifications, new ships and their complement of men and supplies; then increasing demands for ammunition as the battle lines extend and the fighting keeps pace. All this time relief measures for families left without their supporters have been expanding. Now hospital expenses are added—by no means the smallest item in the bulging budget. The necessary money to meet the bills must be borrowed by government, and at war-time rates, which swell the total enormously. Prices for food at all necessities rise. Then is added the waste of inefficient men who must be broken to the ways of war. Advances and retreats on the plain of battle use up a vast amount of costly material. Prices for all munition up as the demand grows. And on top of all this must be piled the loss of income to the nation at large through the semi-paralysis of its industries. Small wonder that the cost for the nations now at it has leaped to a bagatelle of $8,000,000 daily to $25,000,000, and is still bounding.

So here is the formula for America to consider: An army; a declaration of war; an army quadrupled—and then repeat; a fleet hurriedly made twice the size; munition factories multiplied by six and worked day and night; coast defenses redoubled; provision for manless families; provision for a fast hospital service; issues of government bonds to raise the cash for what has been done and what is expected for another six months; a year (sufficient unto each period must be the bond issue thereof; in other words, we get this budget taken care of we can cover the next); upward trend of prices for everything; cost of training raw recruits (of course in our case that item will be very small, now that Plattsburg has transformed a thousand well-to-do civilians into efficient army officers by a four weeks' lark); loss of business throughout the country; loss of foreign markets for our products; pensions. To say nothing of the orgy of hate and fury and death upon the battlefields and the after years of broken hearts and homes—a drain upon civilization far more important to consider than cars and cents.

THE RECORD INTERNATIONAL LOAN ACCOMPLISHED. The Franco-French war loan of $500,000,000 was fully subscribed at the offices of J. P. Morgan & Co., on October 5, for the most part in large amounts, munitions concerns being among the heaviest subscribers. It is stated that if the books had not been closed promptly the loan would have been much over-subscribed. This loan is secured by 5-year bonds of the two nations at 5 per cent., the bonds being guaranteed by the members of the underwriting syndicate at 96 and will be offered to the public at 98. In congratulating the country upon this, J. P. Morgan declared that it was not a war loan, but an extension of credit to the two nations made in the interests of the free commercial supremacy of this country. "This is not a pro-Allies or an anti-German loan, it is pro-American," declared Mr. Morgan, who assured his hearers that the expectation of any first-class nation by the war out of the question, and that the bonds are therefore absolutely secure as a first mortgage on all the resources of the creditor nation in accordance with the character of all external loans.

AN ANTISEPTIC WORLD. A contemporary, in what we must suppose is a cautious mood, suggests that the quickest and surest solution of the problem of national health would be to isolate every one. This does not strike us as practicable. It has its advantages; and yet the demands of business, society, religion, recreation, education, law-keeping and politics are such that if each of us were isolated from everybody else, those accidents of life would simply go unattended to. We do not see at all how this can be warded off, although we admit the national health should be conserved. We sympathize with those leaders of public thought who would have the public think of its health. We cannot as yet endorse their universal, professional, pay-as-you-enter physical examination as the only possible method for maintaining their object—assuming, of course, that their object is solely a conservation of national health. We suggest tentatively for their consideration that they take the textile industry into their plan and advocate a germ-proof material which must be used by every individual for the making of every article of wearing apparel. This can be done. We have not thought out how. But surely if every man, woman and child were clothed from head to foot in nothing but germ-proof materials, there would be nothing left for the doctor to do. (This shows the folly of proposing a thing before you have thought it out. Until we wrote that last line it did not occur to us that the ultimate result of this plan would be, of course, now the thing is not to be thought of at all. Please let none of our readers read this paragraph which we have just written.)

ENRICHING OUR MEAGER VOCABULARY. The word "dumping" has lately leaped into commercial lingo, and will pay

We believe we have found the exact cause of the delay in mailing and have effectually remedied it. an important part in new legislation at Washington this winter. Anti-dumping laws were aimed at foreign countries to prevent flooding of competitive goods on our market at values to the importer lower than their fair market value at home in ordinary course of trade. Other countries have anti-dumping laws and because of the probability after the war attempts to re-establish markets in the United States for products which have been during the war, by underselling American-made goods, Congress is expected to place an anti-dumping law upon our statute books.

CROPS FOLLOW SHELL PLOWING. Although the soil of France has been plowed and harrowed by shell and shrapnel, scant seed has been planted in the north, and elsewhere, where workers there has been a dearth. The American Commercial Attaché at Paris advises Washington that the wheat crop of France will probably fall far short of the need—312,000,000 bushels—Belgian refuse keeping up the demand which would otherwise have decreased because of war conditions—and imports cannot be relied on, the estimated value of which is about $185,000,000.

WELCOME TO THE RESERVE. It is stated that undergraduates and other men at Yale University will organize a field artillery company, and that Major General Leonard Wood, United States Army, will be instructors to drill the student recruits as a part in the general plan for national preparedness.

CARRYING THE DYE CREW TOO FAR. Inspectors of the Health Department of New York City recently discovered a codfish dyeing industry in full blast under the arches of the Brooklyn Bridge, the object of the dyeing being to obtain good red salmon at about ten cents a pound to retail at forty and more. The interesting process included the use of paragon acid and Zanzibar red, two poisons unknown to most of us, fortunately. The food was found in shades ranging from deep red through a pretty pink and so on down to a natural white. They looked so edible in its latter condition that the dyeing was stopped. But a word to the wise is sufficient. Lenses inadvertently reflect upon innocent persons, we will add that this strange industry had no connection with the $15,000,000 Food Dyeing and Chemical Company of New York, just recently incorporated in Delaware, supposedly (according to reports) by agents identified with the Standard Oil Company and the DuPont de Nemours Powder Company. It is expected that Congress will enact a law that will protect the American dyestuff industry from too keen foreign competition after the close of the war.

COLUMBIA WORLD'S LARGEST SCHOOL. Columbia University now leads the colleges of the world in the number of students enrolled. The entering class this year numbers 1,059, passing the thousand mark for the first time. The total enrollment on October 5 was 14,573 students, on the same date last year 12,743 were enrolled. With the night school enrollment and the enrollment in the extension teaching department the total will probably reach another 5,000 while the class entering in February will still further increase the totals. The total income of the university for the year just past was $2,920,031, and the expenditures exceeded the income by $13,592.55. The approximate cost per student last year was therefore $255.

PREPARING FOR DEFENSE. The New Inventions Board of the Navy, headed by Thomas A. Edison, met in Washington for the first time on October 5. The new board put in two days inspecting the government proving grounds and experimental equipment, and perfecting its formal organization. While at the Indian Head proving grounds the board inspected one of the new fourteen-inch 50-caliber rifles for the battleship Idaho. This gun is considered superior to the fifteen-inch guns of the British battleship Queen Elizabeth. Secretary Daniels had expressed the opinion that the "two greatest problems of BIG SLIDE RECALLS THE MASTER BUILDER. On October 5, the Panama Canal was ordered closed to traffic until November 1. The order caused consternation in the ranks of the masters of the more than ninety vessels which were waiting to pass through the canal. The slides that have now blocked the canal are among the most serious that have occurred since the water was let in. The canal has made a good record since its opening in July, 1914. It has made possible an all-water traffic in merchandise that could not be handled on all-every change of angle. The purser was in constant danger of his life, but his calls for help were unheard. He wisely relied more on his legs than his lungs, however, and in a lull of the passengers, officers discovered his serious plight and rescued him through a window. Then the safe was lassoed, after the method laid down by Victor Hugo in his classic of the cannon. A great many tropical birds were blown seaward and settled on the ship's rigging, so exhausted that they were easily caught by the passengers and crew after the storm. It's an ill wind that blows no one a good story.

NEW JERSEY ONE-TWENTY-FIFTH HAPPY. The state department of motor vehicles announces that one in every twenty-five residents of New Jersey either owns an automobile or is licensed to run one; or, approximately, 115,000 New Jersey people are now content with their lot.

TWO HUNDRED MEN FIGHT TO SAVE NINE. On Monday, September 27, nine miners were caught in a tunnel of the Lehigh Coal and Navigation Company at Coaldale, Pa., by a slide of coal dust, and were forced to take refuge at the top of a chute by a flood of water from an abandoned tunnel. Two hundred miners and company officials worked at high pressure for six days to reach the entombed men. They had to blast their way through solid rock and a mass of timbers that had been brought down by the flood, and on a raft forced their way toward the different chutes. Other obstacles baffled them, and hope had about been given up when, in the afternoon of Sunday, October 3, the nine men were found huddled together at the top of Chute 27. They had been kept alive for the six days by the contents of one man's dinner pail and the fish oil cakes which miners carry for their lamps; but during the last two days they had been foodless. Thousands surrounded the mouth of the mine to see the men brought to safety. Their families had had no way to know what the searching party might find. The nine men were greatly weakened, but the hospital authorities believed that the 150 hours' terrible imprisonment would be survived by all.

THE PRESIDENT SUPPORTS SUFFRAGE. Last January when a delegation of woman suffragists stormed the office of President Wilson and sought to capture his influence in favor of the proposed suffrage amendment to the National Constitution, the President heard them courteously and refused them absolutely, stating that he did not consider the question one that it was proper to take out of the hands of the States. He would not at that time commit himself as to his personal opinion of the merits of the question. For some days rumors had been current that the President and members of his cabinet were in favor of woman suffrage. On October 6, the President set all rumors at rest by making a formal statement setting forth his intention to vote for woman suffrage at the election to be held in New Jersey on October 19, and stating that he believed that the time had come to extend that privilege and responsibility to the women of the State. Secretaries Garrison, McAdoo and Private Secretary Tumulty had already taken a definite stand for "the cause."

First Meeting of the New Naval Advisory Board of Scientists

the navy are aeronautics and submarine science." The Secretary said that there was no cut-and-dried program for the meetings of the board; the members of which serve without pay and pay their own expenses when in Washington. In addressing the members of the board on Wednesday, October 6, the President said: "I think the whole nation is convinced that we ought to be prepared, not for war, but for defense and very adequately prepared and that the preparation for defense is a matter in which we must have the cooperation of the best brains and knowledge of the country. I want you to feel that we have a very serious purpose. The spirit of America is one of peace, but one of independence." The first result of the Board's work was a plan to establish a United States laboratory for research and experiment at an expenditure of about $5,000,000 and an annual operating budget of between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000. One feature of the proposed laboratory will be a dock of sufficient depth to admit a dreadnought; this idea fixes the location, of course, at a sea port, but the selection of the site was not made.

ALASKAN RAILROAD BEGUN. The first twenty miles of the new Alaskan Railroad, authorized by Congress last year, have been completed, and Secretary Lane reported to the President on October 4 that satisfactory progress was being made with the remaining 450 miles.

WILL FILL THE BREACH IN PURITY'S BULWARKS. The Society for the Suppression of Vice, of which the late Anthony Comstock was the noted head, has appointed rail routes because of the relative cost; it has doubled our coast-to-coast trade; and it has taken traffic from the railroads and compelled reductions in rates. Steamship lines operating through the waterway are carrying constantly increasing cargoes; but with all the prosperity of Uncle Sam's big ditch, it is still a long way behind the Suez Canal in total traffic. In December, 1914, the Panama Canal passed 99 vessels of 439,915 net tons, and the Suez Canal passed 347 vessels of 2,451,420 net tons, a slight decrease from 1913. Only 50 of the 496 vessels that passed through the Panama Canal in the first six months of its operation were bound to or from the Far East. Major General Goethals withdrew his recently accepted resignation and stayed on the job to force the channel through again. Orders have been issued to the engineers to blast away the tops of the hills as a means of removing the source of these slides.

HURRICANE MAKES STRANGE BED-FELLOWS. Ripping winds that blew so hard that waves were carried clear across decks without spilling a drop, tossed the fruit steamer Almirante in an unmannerly fashion on her trip from Colon to New York late in September. The vessel carried eighty Jamaican negro passengers with their families, besides some Spanish-Americans, and none of these were keyed up to the beauties of a storm at sea. The real sport of the hurricane, however, was an 800-pound safe which it tore from its lashings in the purser's cabin. The purser was in, and stayed in for five hours trying to keep the safe out of his berth. The ship often went over to an angle of 45 degrees, the captain states. The safe unerringly followed

THE Balkans are once more the storm center of the war. On Sunday, October 3, Russia presented an ultimatum to Bulgaria giving her forty-four hours in which to openly break with the Central Powers. Russia's ultimatum was sent after consultation with the other powers of the Quadruple Entente. Through delay in transmission, the ultimatum was not received by Bulgaria until four o'clock Monday afternoon. The time limit expired at four o'clock on Tuesday afternoon. Bulgaria rejected the Russian demands and continued to push resolutely the mobilization and placing of her troops. The Russian, British, French and Italian Ministers at once asked for their passports.

(Sunday, 70,000 French troops were landed at Salonica. These troops were landed in spite of the protest of Greece that such landing was in violation of her neutrality. The French ambassador at Athens notified the Greek government of the intended landing, and assured Greece that the troops were intended only to assist Serbia against the threatened Teuton and Bulgarian attack. Premier Venizelos did not press the protest against the landing, and defended his lack of energy before the Greek Chamber of Deputies, declaring the French troops had come to fight the battles of Greece's ally, Serbia, and to give that aid which Greece would be required to give under her alliance with Serbia. The treaty between Greece and Serbia provides that if either of them is attacked by another Balkan power the other will come to her aid. The Chamber upheld the premier but the king advised him that he was unable to support the policy of the ministry, and the premier and his cabinet resigned on October 6.

Reports from Rumanian sources indicate that Field-Marshal von Mackensen with an army of 250,000 Germans and 2,000 guns has been transferred from the Russian front to the Serbian frontier, and that the expected attack upon Serbia will be under the direct supervision of the conqueror of Galicia.

On the western front, during the week, the French and British have made some further attacks to the northward in Champagne and to the eastward in Artois, the French announcing on October 5 the capture of a hill north of Tabure in Champagne which was a point of support in the German second line. Berlin reported all attacks repulsed. The Germans have maintained severe counter attacks against the trenches taken in the Allied advance of September 24-26. Small trench sections and outpost positions have changed hands repeatedly, but the action has gradually been reduced to an artillery duel upon the new lines finally established after the attack.

In the east, the Russians seem to have been able to retain the offensive, but they claim no material gain, and German reports chronicle only repulses of Russian attacks. The Russians have retaken a few small villages south of Dvinsk, and have improved their positions all along the line, straightening out their front between Dvinsk and Minsk. The German troops which broke through in the region of Smorgon, appear to have been halted.

The Power of Christianity

TEXT: ACTS 1:8 "But ye shall receive power when the Holy Spirit is come upon you."

WE are born into a world of power and grow up in it without fully understanding it. Nature herself, through her seasons, her exhibitions of force in storm, and her majestic silences in calm, speaks constantly of the marvelous creation that has never made anything weak or without its mystery. The power of the solar system has never been weighed or measured and probably never will be. And the power of the forces which we call gravitation, heat, electricity, light and movement are so full of tremendous and never ceasing energy that the mind of man after all these centuries is awed and astounded at the greatness of the display and the tireless sweep of a whole universe, which never wears out or runs down.

Men are also ready to admire and cheer large illustrations of human power in the building of great works of utility or skill. The making of the Panama Canal was possible because it appealed to the imagination of the people. The immense outlay and the vast enterprise needed to cut a continent in two spoke of power beyond the ordinary, and the people were willing to bear the expense. Great buildings in modern cities also excite wonder and provoke admiration because men love to see great things.

The power exerted by the mind of man also gives to humanity a degree of pleasure that nothing else gives in the same degree. A great poem excites the sensibilities and rouses the imagination. A great oratorio appeals to the highest emotions. A great speech or sermon stirs something in us that longs for great things. The exhibition of a powerful government controlled and directed by mental and moral forces compels our admiration. The power of mind to create and construct and shape institutions is a form of power to which we yield instinctive praise.

He Has Chosen the Weak

IF ever any group of men needed to feel power in a peculiar sense, it was the group brought together by Jesus during his brief earthly career. It was a group of men without wealth, social standing, political influence or military training. It lacked every single thing that counted for power in those days. The country in which these men lived was a conquered province, not so large as the state of New Hampshire. The person who had brought them together was an obscure peasant, unknown to the great military power that finally allowed him to be put to death on a flimsy charge of treason.

Surely if any men ever needed power, if they were going to make the world bow down to them, these men needed it. It was the one thing in all the world they did need.

And Jesus promised it to them. How has that promise been made good?

History tells it. Within three centuries the obscure peasant had become the most prominent figure in the greatest world empire. His followers during the next five centuries ruled crowned heads and dictated national policies, and the cross had become the best known symbol in the whole world.

History tells it in the summing up of the world's art and music and painting and literature and philanthropy. As Sylvester Horne said, "The Christian cathedral is different in kind from the noblest form of classical temple. Music can hardly be said to have found itself and given permanent expression to human aspiration until it became the handmaid of Christianity."

Historically, the power which Jesus promised his disciples has made a new world, and is making it all the time. The very war, which seemed at first to many people to prove that Christianity was a failure, has brought to the front the spirit of protest against war that Christianity brought into the world—the spirit which was not here at all when Jesus was born, the spirit which at last will put a final end to the entire military power of all the nations.

"Not as the World Giveth"

IT is worth while to note that all through the centuries the power which Jesus promised his disciples has been expressed in certain forms, which we may call old established forms of Christian energy, and most of it has poured forth in a great stream of healing through the organized church.

These regular forms of power are preaching and worship; the use of the greatest Text-Book in the world, the Bible; regular religious instruction of the young, notably through the Sunday school; social service for humanity; the prayer circle; and the constant presentation of Jesus to all men as a Redeemer.

Added to these old forms of power, new methods of applying Jesus' teaching are being used. Some of them are federating church denominations in order to avoid waste and overlapping; the use of dramatic instinct to enforce religious truth; a larger use of young life in church work; a new use of the midweek service; new methods of parish work; new evangelistic methods; and a larger use of the printed page and the printing press generally.

But while applied Christianity uses methods different in many ways from the methods in use in Jesus' time, it is significant that the power itself remains unchanged. There are four common earthly powers: Financial, political, military, and intellectual. But the power that Jesus promised his disciples was different from all these, and greater than all of them put together.

The Great Condition

THE power that Jesus promised his disciples was the power to change the hearts of men. It was the power to create a new definition of life, to make men think of others, to give them a horror of sin and a hunger for service, to create a faith in the brotherhood and a longing to bring it to pass.

This is the greatest power men have ever known, and in the end it will overcome the world. One reason why Christianity seems to fail is not because it is a failure, but because the tremendous task of making all over the very structure of thought and purpose in men is a task that requires more time than to learn how to make money, train armies, construct policies or write books. The evangelization of the world is the most stupendous task ever undertaken. The building of forty-seven-story buildings or of a Panama Canal is childish toy-making by the side of reconstructing humanity. Is it any wonder it takes time?

Jesus made one condition to receiving this power—"when the Holy Spirit is come upon you." It is no mystery here. The Holy Spirit is known by its fruits, and they are these: love, joy, peace, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, meekness, self-control. If the Christian disciple has these virtues practically in his life, the Holy Spirit has come upon him and he has the power that Jesus promised, because he has the fruits of the Spirit. And the degree of the Christian's power will be in proportion to the extent of these fruits of the Spirit in the Christian's life.

"Lord, Give Us This Power"

THE world stands in need of this power today as never in all its history. The world does not need any more power financially, politically, intellectually; and above all, it needs no more power of a military kind. But it does need the power of the Holy Spirit to change men's hearts, to make them love one another, to direct their misdirected energies, to control their lustful passions, to make them believe in the solidarity and the love of God.

Think what a world this would be if the power of the Holy Spirit ruled men! At once all war would cease. The immense energy now exerted to destroy would be used to develop. The hatred men have for one another would be changed into mutual fraternal service. The world does not yet know what peace is, what political ideals are, what intellect can do, until it is ruled by Jesus' power, the power of the Spirit.

Oh, church of the Master! Founded by him, led by him, consecrated by the centuries of redemption! Now is your greatest time to prove your power to the world! Now is the greatest time in all history for the Christian to acquire those virtues of the Spirit which shall help him to conquer the world, to bring in the reign of universal peace and world-wide fraternity. It can be done in only one way: through the Spirit.

Disciples of Jesus, will you meet the condition? The power is yours when the Spirit is come upon you.

Church of the living God,
Born of the Spirit's power,
This is the day of might,
This is the very hour;
Rise in the strength of him,
Master of life and love;
Open the heart to take Virtues that rise above
Common and earth-born things;
Virtues that have the breath
Of God and heaven in them,
And fear not sin or death;
Spirit of power, we pray,
Breathe on our souls, and give Peace, that thy men may love;
Love, that thy world may live.

The Man Who Buried His Soul

By JAMES M. DAVIS

THERE is a fable—but is it a fable?—that tells of a man who in his youth possessed a soul; a tender, true, aspiring soul which delighted in music, and in the contemplation of sublime thoughts. But the man had a great ambition for wealth and power, and as much had to be accomplished before he could reach his goal, he became a very busy man indeed. As the years rolled by, he began to find his soul a sore inconvenience. It stopped him to gaze at the sunset; it led him forth against his will to inhale the sweet, pure freshness of the fields and woods after the summer rain. It led him into art galleries, it delayed him on the sidewalk because in a home near by a beautiful voice was singing the air of an old memory-laden song. In hundreds of such ways the man's soul proved itself a nuisance and a hindrance.

So it came about that one day the man decided to free himself from his soul until he should achieve his fortune and satisfy his ambition. "Then," said he, "when I have leisure to indulge my soul and to enjoy, through it, the beauties of the world, I will take it to myself again." So he selected an unfrequented spot in a wood, and there, in the soft, rich earth, he buried his soul, covering it carefully with earth and leaves and boughs.

Then he returned to the city, where he became rich and powerful. Neither sunset, nor sweet-voiced birds, nor the freshness of the summer rain, nor marvelous paintings, nor loftiest poems, nor even the melody of an old tender song that might have carried recollections of the long ago, delayed him now, or turned him aside even for one fleeting moment. But presently he grew satiated with wealth and power; he became discontented; the world was flat and unprofitable; something was missing.

Then he bethought himself of his soul, and returned to the little mound where he had buried it. He saw no beauty now in the sky or fragrance in the world; the singing of the birds was but a sound in his ears, and the thousand little things that once would have charmed and delighted his senses were passed unnoticed.

The little mound was as he had left it. Carefully he plucked away the brush and leaves and earth and uncovered his soul. But alas! alas! there was only a gray, shriveled something that turned to ashes at his touch. "And what shall it profit a man if he gains the whole world and lose his own soul?"

Daily Meditation

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR

An Annexing Nature

SUNDAY, October 24. II Peter 1:5. "Add to your faith virtue; and to virtue knowledge." In the life of Walter Bagehot, his biographer uses a very luminous and suggestive sentence: "His nature was always annexing, and annexing what was best." He was continually adding to his unseen possessions. Those estates of the spirit upon which no man can lay a measuring line grew larger and richer every year. His life never reached the danger line of satisfaction. He had the genius and fervor of annexation. He preserved his gains by more daring explorations.

His genius of annexation is the secret of progress in the spiritual life. Our Lord proclaimed it in many different ways. "Seek! Ask! Knock!" What is that but the spirit of exploring enterprise? "Blessed are they which hunger and thirst after righteousness." What is that but the sacred acquisitiveness which is always gratified but never satisfied, because it is always beholding new treasure which it yearns to possess? And the apostle Peter defines Bagehot's spirit of annexation and gives it its highest application in his recent counsel: "Add to your faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge, and to . . ."

Every Christian believer has ample opportunities for annexation. Indeed, when is opportunity absent? In these fields we have not to wait for chances. They are every moment at our door. And our opportunity is at its richest when there seems to be no treasure about it. It is the apparently waste things that often have astounding wealth. I know a lead mine where for years and years the waste stuff lay in countless tons around the shaft. There was no use for it. And one day an annexing nature came along, and he began to busy himself with that waste-heap, and he found it to be the home of boundless fortune!

And those waste places of suffering, and disappointment, and failure, and heavy sodden grief—it is our wisdom to annex them, and by the spirit of the Lord to work their secret wealth. But indeed, every season offers a prospect for the annexing believer in Christ Jesus. Never does an experience come to us which does not hide the riches of spiritual ore. We must be enterprising explorers. We must be vigilant merchants, on the lookout for pearls of great price, incident in the assurance that every occasion will yield the soul something of the unsearchable riches of Christ. J. H. J.

Through Shadow to Sunshine

MONDAY, October 25. Gen. 49:22. "Joseph is a fruitful bough, a fruitful bough by a fountain; his branches run over the wall." These words are a part of Job's prophecy regarding his son Joseph; they picture the sunshine period in the life of a man who was not unacquainted with the shadow.

Like many another, Joseph began his life in the faded light of pampered home surroundings. Then came his captivity, and with his slavery new lessons and opportunities to be of help to others. He uses his precious gift to interpret the dreams of his fellow prisoners, and this leads him to the court of Pharaoh and on to the office of premier of the king of Egypt. In his hour in the dungeon he begins to tread a new road, the road of help to others. His early selfishness slowly drops from him, and when his brethren come seeking help from famine, Joseph is ready with forgiveness and the greatness of soul that marks the maturity of the man.

In many a man or woman, it is the captivity that predestines the true freedom. Out of the cloud the sun breaks forth, and as we look back upon the dark places of our life journey, we thank God for the shadow that introduced us to the sunshine, because it turned our selfishness into service, converted our pride in prayer, made our sorrow the key to sympathy, freed us to save our lives by teaching us to give them to others in their need. The trouble with the boy Joseph was that everything seemed easy for him, there was no shut door, no obstacles to overcome and no sense of need in his heart. His star was always in the ascendant, his sheaf always outgrew the sheaves of his brethren. He was lost in his sunshine, he could be saved only by the shadow.

Is my life filled with burdens? Do I know the sting of poverty? Has the promise of my morning been broken by the failure of ideals, by the mist and the rain? God is leading through shadow to sunshine. Let me remember Joseph. C. S. C.

God Always Keeps His Covenants

TUESDAY, October 26. Isa. 48:1-11. "For my own sake, for my own sake, will I do it." It is a most extraordinary fact that the Hebrew race preserves its integrity among all the nations of the world. From the fall of Jerusalem, the Inquisition, the German, Russian, and British nations until recently have treated them with the severest methods; but as in the days of Pharaoh, the more they have been afflicted, the more have they multiplied and increased. If we look into the history of every nation, however strong and virile, and remember their almost invulnerable fate in the rub of the centuries, one of the most stupendous facts in modern life is the presence of this people. And if we inquire the reason, it is given here: "For my name's sake will I defer mine anger, and for my praise will I refrain from thee, that I cut thee not off."

God's nature is the only explanation of God's dealings with men. But there is this comfort for us: that when once God enters into covenant relationship with the soul, he never retreats from his engagement. "If we believe not, he remaineth faithful, he cannot deny himself." The mountains may depart and the hills be removed, but the covenant of his peace shall stand fast for ever.

If God has been so continuous in his gracious kindness to his ancient people, notwithstanding their waywardness, rebellion, and hardness of heart, does that not prove his eternal purpose to be unchangeable in regard to us? Directly we become related to Christ by a living faith, we are included in God's covenant relationship. "If ye are Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise." We may therefore say to our heavenly Father: "Thou hast chosen me in Christ, and thou canst not, wilt not let me go; thou wilt love me evermore; my union with thee does not depend on my obedience or goodness, but on thyself. For thine own sake, keep and guide me to the end." F. B. M.

The Comforter Abides

WEDNESDAY, October 27. John 14:15-24. "Another Comforter." Our Lord knew what he had been to his disciples—the center round whom they rallied, their Teacher, Brother, Master; and he would not have tantalized them by promising another Paraclete, unless he had thought of the Holy Spirit as being as distinct a personality as he was. "I have been a Paraclete for you," said our Lord in effect; "but I am now going to plead your cause in the Father's presence; but another will take my place, to be my other self, and abide with you for ever."

There is no adequate translation of Paraclete. It may be rendered Comforter, Helper, Advocate, Interpreter, but no one word suffices. The Greek simply means one whom you call to your side, in a battle or lawsuit, to assist you by word or act. Such a one is Christ, and such is the Holy Spirit. He is a definite Person whom you can call to, lean on, or work with. The Spirit is not a breath, or an influence, but a Person, whom you may summon to your side.

There is a precise analogy between the two Paracletes. (Compare this verse with I John 2:1, RV, margin.) Each was in the world before his specific advent, either at the nativity or at Pentecost. The coming of each into closer contact with humanity was preannounced. Each has been manifested in a body—that born of the Virgin, and the Church. Each is with us to the end. This is preeminently the age of the Holy Spirit. "He shall be with you for ever." The electric current is vibrating around. Alas for us, if we have lost the art of using its mighty energy! F. B. M.

The Ministry of Pity

THURSDAY, October 28. Num. 17:8. "And, behold, the rod of Aaron for the house of Levi was budded, and put forth buds, and produced blossoms, and bare ripe almonds." Much of the lesson of the Bible is written in symbolism. The blossoming of the rod of Aaron is for us a beautiful symbol of kindness and pity, the accompaniments of every great Christian soul.

Aaron was made the head of the church as Moses stood for the secular side of the children of Israel in their desert wanderings. Twelve branches of the almond tree were deposited in the tabernacle or sacred tent of these desert people. Each rod represented one of the twelve heads of the twelve tribes of Israel. There was added to these a thirteenth, the rod of Aaron, who represented the spiritual force of that company. On the morrow, Moses entered the tent to find the rod of Aaron bursting into bloom, while the other rods, the symbols of the secular power, remained as they were.

In the preceding chapter we see Aaron running into the midst of the plague-stricken people, standing "between the dead and the living," to make atonement for the men whom he served as priest. He stands in the very midst of them, he takes his place of loving and self-sacrificing service, not on a mountain apart, but in the breath of the contagion threatening his people. His rod had burst into softness and pity; he takes the human side of self-obliterating sympathy; he is the priest of pity and of love.

Moses stood for secular law, Aaron stood for divine love. When the church forgets its pity for suffering, sinning humanity, it forgets its most divine priesthood. Its order reads, "If a man be overtaken in a fault restore him in the spirit of meekness." Strict justice may rule in the secular courts, but pity is the queen of the Christian's rule. The blossoming rod of Aaron is a prefiguring of the cross on Calvary. C. S. C.

The Power of the Ministry of Prayer

FRIDAY, October 29. I Tim. 2:1-15. "That supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks be made for all men." A godly man of my acquaintance, who was no longer able to exercise the ministerial office, devoted his life to the high and noble work of intercession. From breakfast till his midday meal, and again from 5 or 6 o'clock till 10 p.m., he was accustomed to bear up before God his brethren in the ministry, missionaries specially, and Christian workers of all the churches, in all lands. As he prayed, the area of his prayers extended, and his power with God increased. Something of the same power was exerted by the godly invalid who always accompanied Mr. Finney in his great evangelistic campaigns. He was so infirm that he needed to be carried to his bed on arriving at a given town, and in that bed he remained for the duration of the mission; but from his chamber he was able to exert a very distinct influence on the conjoint effort to win souls for the Kingdom. It repeated in modern times the old story of the success of Joshua, while Moses stood on the mount with uplifted hands.

It is not an exaggeration to say that God needs our prayers as the condition of his saving help. His house is filled with every good thing that we need for our friends who have come off their journey to us, and are weary, hungry, and destitute. But he requires that we should espouse their need and approach him, pleading the cause of those who have not the time or the inclination to do it for themselves. If a little fountain in the plains, far away from the mountains, spurts up with new energy, because a shower of rain has fallen on the distant peaks, how much more will fountains arise amid the deserts of life, making them rejoice and blossom, when we pray. F. B. M.

The Fountain of Love in the Heart

SATURDAY, October 30. Matt. 22:39. "And the second is like unto it." Loving God is first; loving God's children is very like loving God. Is it not so like as to be equivalent or equally binding? Indeed, does not one include the other? Inasmuch as ye have helped your neighbor, ye have helped Me. "He that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God, whom he hath not seen?" But love will not respond to law or force or command. Obedience may, but love never. Love comes by letting Christ come into your heart. "We love him because he first loved us." Love begets love; his love kindles the dead fires and makes our hearts burn within us. Then we love all mankind.

When we are willing to love our Father and our Saviour, we are begotten of God and know God, and as love's incense rises upward, it spreads outward until it is everywhere in the great family of God. Love for our Father and love for our brother are so alike that they flow from one heart fountain, each being proof of the other and so interlocked as to be inseparable. These golden cords of love, intertwined around God and man, unite men into one common brotherhood, and all to the great white throne of the God of love. E. W. C.

The Present-Day Question

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

ALTHOUGH the Madison Square Garden may suggest mass meetings to the politician, and horse shows to the ultra-smart set, it had always made me think of elephants, and endless rings, and eyes that ached with the pleasant agony of trying to see a hundred marvelous things at once. Since I was a tiny child the Madison Square Garden had always made me think of the giant circuses that live there in the springtime. After this the Madison Square Garden will call up a very different picture to my mind.

Outside of the door they had pasted a poster that said in huge black letters, "First American Industrial Education Exposition and Conference." The name looked formidable, so formidable that I sighed as I mounted the steps that led from the sun-filled streets to the cool quietness that I expected to find in the great hall.

It wasn't quiet inside. And, somehow, I didn't miss the sunlight; for, as I stepped through the doorway a pleasant sound leaped out to meet me, a sound that was a combination of hammering and sawing, singing and talking, piano music and the clatter of many feet. I walked up the flight of stairs that led to the main exposition room—I walked quickly. For the noise was an interesting noise, a busy noise.

NEAR the doorway a number of boys were pounding with mallets and sawing with saws and chopping with axes. They were absorbed in the work of building something, and as I stepped near to them, I saw that it was the frame work of a house that they were working on. As yet it was a mere skeleton of a house, but the straight steady lines of it held the promise of beauty as well as of strength. As I looked at the boys I saw something of the spirit of their handiwork gleaming in their faces—the impress of a beauty of structure and a lasting strength. And, as I looked, I knew that those boys were building not only a house. They were building character.

Later I learned that these same boys were pupils of the "Boys' Vocational Truant School" of Flushing, Long Island, and when I heard it my surprise was deep, for the earnest faces that bent over the work of building were not truant faces. According to Webster's dictionary a truant is "an idler" and "a shirk." But neither idlers nor shirks could build houses and enjoy building them as those boys did.

As I walked away from the house that was growing almost as rapidly as one of my castles in Spain, I came to a line of tiny booths that showed the ideal interior of a house. They showed in rapid succession a bedroom, bathroom, living-room, dining-room, and kitchen. In each room there were two girls; perhaps their ages ranged from ten to fourteen years. Some, from the looks of them, were not very well-to-do children—none of them could have been rich, but their little homes shone in dustless, artistic perfection. In the dining-room the table was set correctly. In the kitchen there was a luncheon in the process of being made, and jelly glasses being sterilized. I imagine that dishes had not been sterilized in any of their home kitchens. . . . I wonder how many homes-to-be will feel the influence of the little girls who learned housekeeping in school.

Across the aisle from the last of the little rooms I saw a class in plumbing. As I followed the left gestures of a boy as he poured melted lead on a bent pipe and patted it down to perfect smoothness, I remembered certain frozen pipes in the wintertime and found myself wishing that they had taught plumbing when the masculine members of my family were in school.

AFTER about two hours I found myself in front of the headquarters of the executive committee. There I met Mrs. George Kerr, who was the original inspiration for this truly wonderful exhibition.

"The exposition," said Mrs. Kerr in answer to my question, "grew out of a long-felt need. My husband and I had realized the need, and one day I went to the Board of Education and laid my plans before them. The result was—but you saw the result."

"Governor Whitman and Mrs. Whitman were our honorary chairmen, and their little daughter was our mascot. There were representatives from all over the United States. The National Commissioner of Education from Washington, and commissioners from Connecticut, Missouri, Maryland, Massachusetts and Indiana attended."

"Mr. Hendershot, founder of the co-operation schools, was so impressed by the exhibits that he said: 'It is so wonderful you need at least a week to think about it, before you really begin to see it.' Mr. Osborne, warden of Sing Sing, said: 'If we had more vocational schools we would need fewer penitentiaries.'"

"The present-day question," said this capable and enthusiastic woman, "is the getting and keeping of jobs. And vocational training teaches how this can be done."

THE present-day question, as I left the great building, was a city spangled with faintly gleaming yellow lights. Behind any of those lights, I knew, were homes; in many of those homes there were children, and, perhaps, ten years from now, one-tenths of those children were out in the world trying to get a job—and keep it. Will they have the training?

That is the present-day question. And the answer to it lies without.

School Boys Making Boats That Are the Real Thing

School Girls Who Do Not Intend to Be Idlers Later On

Somewhere—perhaps during the childhood of the man who has accomplished something—lies a moment of impetus, from which sprang one stern purpose in life. Learn of such an incident, then scan his career, and you realize the tremendous power which is laid in the hand of a parent for good or ill.—JOHN McDONALD.

AN old circuit judge in Massachusetts was the despair of every lawyer who tried a case before him. Circumstantial evidence counted with him as almost nothing. Stern justice, with the story of each witness weighed and sifted, then resifted, was his demand for poor as well as rich. Prejudice he pierced with an intuition which was almost feminine, and his rigorous rulings made him famous everywhere. Once, in a case which became historic, he saved from the gallows a man with enough circumstantial evidence accumulated against him to insure the death sentence. A few months later, the murderer made confession and went to the gallows. One day I heard several old lawyers discuss him and the stand he had invariably taken for unswerving justice to every human being under suspicion. In one instance he stood absolutely alone in his opinion of a prisoner at the bar. "The night that trial closed," said an old attorney, "I went to see him. He lay on his library couch 'tired to death,' so he confessed. We talked there in the firelight for an hour or two. "What led you to believe the man was innocent?" I asked curiously. "He looked a jail bird if ever a fellow did, and there was certainly evidence enough to convict him."

"The evidence was purely circumstantial," began the old judge slowly. "I did not know whether he was innocent or not. I simply saw to it, as I have done all my life, that he had a fair chance. In a curious way I believe that my father taught me to stand for impartial judgment to all men. He was as stern as any descendant of the old Puritan stock which demands an eye for an eye. When I was a youngster we started a little dramatic club. Ten boys belonged to it. We built our own stage in the attic, painted our scenery, wrote our plays, rehearsed them, then acted them to audiences, who paid five cents admission. I had written my first play. I recollect it was an extraordinary blend of Greek tragedy streaked with blood and thunder. Its first production was billed for a Saturday night. I had the star part, and every seat was sold.

"THAT morning our house was turned upside down, in search of an old knife my father had treasured since boyhood. He had loaned it to me about a week before. I remembered distinctly having returned it, even to the minutest details of when and where. He declared I had not, and that he would have rather lost anything he owned than that knife. In his dogmatic fashion he ordered the wheels of domestic machinery stopped until it was found. Each one in the house was called before him to submit to stern questioning, and every vestige of evidence went against me. One servant recollected seeing me use the knife a few days after I declared I had returned it. My gentle mother intervened, but it was useless. The thrashing I received, for I was accused of lying as well as of carelessness, did not hurt half as much as the fact that I was ill-roaded off to bed about the hour when the curtain was to have gone upon my play. The tickets had to be taken back, the money refunded, and an angry audience disappointed, for a drama minus its author and its star was an impossibility.

"One day while my mother was washing one of father's old coats, which had not donned for months, the lost knife dropped from a pocket and fell at his feet. He picked it up and looked keenly at me, but said nothing. Mother, with pity in her lovely eyes, laid her cheek tenderly against my own. I could feel it wet with tears. Ten years later, when my father was an old man, he spoke of that incident. He told me that regret and sorrow had lain on his conscience since the day it happened. I did not say it to him or he then lay dying—but if at the moment when the knife was found he had spoken that regret and sorrow I should have forgiven and forgotten. I believe that the incident swayed me toward the study of law and an ambition to sit upon the bench. I know it lies behind every trait you question, a simple demand for justice meted out to high and low, no matter how unflatteringly the finger of circumstance points at any man or woman accused of a crime."

Field Hospital No. 47

By JOHN NICHOLAS BEFFEL

ALTHOUGH she had not slept for more than thirty-six hours, Monday morning found Eleanor Norman, an English nurse, still working among the wounded in Field Hospital No. 47, some miles inland from Calais. There were 120 cots there, and fifty-two were filled. Now the fighting had grown more intense near Per's Hill, and ever since dawn the earth had been shaken with the detonations from heavier artillery, which had this day been put to use.

The English girl was grateful that her brother was not out there in the fighting. A long-delayed letter from her home in Surrey had reached her the previous day, and she had read it many times during the watches of the night. All was safe and well at home, the letter said, though England was dark with sorrow for her sons who had given themselves to the need.

AT DAWN the Germans had brought a new pressure to bear upon the English and French troops massed along the Belgian border. Potter's Hill, an important strategical point, had been wrested from the enemy, and now the Germans were seeking to regain it. On this day the German forces moved forward under cover of artillery fire, and slowly forced their way up the side of the eminence. Their progress was made only by heavy sacrifice, but the loss of the Allies also was large. It was hand-to-hand fighting now in the front line of English and French trenches, and the enemy ruled.

An English boy stood in a pit and fought alone. His nine comrades lay dead under his feet. He had gathered up their rifles, and used them all. There was blood upon him—much blood—and bandages, which he had tied upon himself.

He was there an hour alone and he fought as if he could not be killed. He fired and fired and shouted to his dead comrades as if they lived, giving them commands. He cursed the Germans—alone he sang.

As while he sang that the boy went down. The fire of his comrades in the pits to the right, which had helped to keep the enemy from reaching his own intrenchment, had weakened and died. He could hear the cries of men on their way out of the world. He recognized the hoarse voices of men with whom he had sat at mess four eternal nights ago, the last mess before they had been ordered into the trenches. He was down in the pit for a minute, and then he lifted himself again to the edge, and went on with his work.

He was firing feverishly now. The Germans were climbing closer and closer, and shouting in token of victory. One of the men beneath his feet seemed to move, and this brought fright to the boy for the first time. He had not been afraid of the dead.

He went on firing, and forgot about the man under him. His cartridges were almost gone. He rose too high above the pit, and a bullet pierced his lung.

The Germans were coming fast now. They had silenced his fellows at the left. Now they were centering their fire on him. He knew this, yet he kept firing. He seemed insensible to the pain of the bullets that were plowing through him. Yet he knew that he was being riddled by the fire. All was red before him. . . . He had fallen across the dead when the Germans swept up over the trenches. His eyes were gone. The boots of the invaders trampled upon him, but he did not feel.

. . . Shortly after this, the English were reinforced by fresh Belgian troops, and the Germans were pushed back down the hill. Again it was a movement in inches, with terrible punishment on both sides.

who had a chance.

The hospital was now filled to overflowing. All day long the wounded had been coming in. The air was chill. . . . She was glad that her brother was not out there in the fighting.

"He was a plucky youngster," said the American physician. "He fought alone in a pit for an hour, and held off the Germans single-handed, using the rifles of his dead comrades. You can see boot-marks on his face, where the Germans trampled on him. . . . He might live even now, for he's of sturdy English stock. But he'll have to take his turn in the operating room, and there are many ahead. He's trying to talk."

There was a cloth over the upper part of the plucky one's face. Eleanor Norman kept glancing toward Cot No. 103, as if something there called to her. But she went on with her work. She sat at the side of Cot No. 53, and was bandaging a shattered Belgian arm anew. This task was nearly finished.

Suddenly an incoherent voice arose from the English boy's cot. He was trying, in stupor, to find words. Then the voice cleared, and the unseeing one was singing.

The song began:

"I walked with you on Surrey downs,
In the rose-hued long ago—"

Eleanor Norman dropped the newly bandaged arm of the Belgian soldier, and sprang to her feet. She started toward Cot No. 103.

"Miss Norman!" The chief physician's voice was urgent behind her. She turned and went to him. "Come to the operating room," the chief said. "I need your help."

The girl faced straight ahead as she entered the operating room, but she heard the boy's song stop, and his voice became unintelligible again.

It was an operation on a French soldier. When it was finished, she came forth, and was immediately pressed into service at Cot No. 15, where a hand had just been amputated. She looked toward Cot No. 103, but it was empty now, and presently they were laying a wounded Belgian there.

Again the American physician and the French nurse were near, and the former was speaking of the boy.

"Did you hear One Hundred and Eight singing as he passed out?" he asked.

"Yes," said the French nurse. "A beautiful voice."

"A voice like a woman's," the American physician said.

"In the Rose-Hued Long Ago . . ."

THEY brought the English boy to Field Hospital No. 47. Ambulance men had found him alive. A survivor in another trench had told them the story of the defense.

He was assigned to Cot No. 108, in the northeast corner of the big tent. An American physician examined him and did what he could. He came over toward the central cots presently, and stood talking with a French nurse.

"Twenty-ninewounds," he said, "and both eyes gone."

Eleanor Norman, the English nurse, overheard. She was busy among the central cots, with patients

THE records of Field Hospital No. 47 show that Andrew Norman, twenty-one years old, of the 1st Surrey Volunteers, died of blood loss, due to numerous bullet-wounds. His commander submitted a copy of those records with a recommendation to the war office that he be enrolled among those for whom special memorial services would be said.

But the English nurse had no need to look at the record to know what it said there. And she never saw the singing one's face. She was going on with her work.

NEWS FROM THE WORKERS

CONFERENCE of Bible Students has been called for November 16-19, under the auspices of the Chicago Hebrew Mission, to set forth a Biblical standpoint the teachings of the Word concerning Israel Past, Present and Future, in the hope of awakening an interest throughout the church on their behalf. Among the speakers will be Dr. C. I. Scofield, Dr. John Timothy Stone, Dr. James M. Gray, Rev. A. B. Simpson, Wm. E. H. Stone, Canon F. E. Howitt, Rev. S. B. Reid, Rev. Max Reich, and others.

WHEN constitutional law was young and churches were used only for the service of worship, of death or of matrimony, one phrase became common in all our basic law, by which edifices or property used "solely and exclusively for religious worship" were exempted from the payment of taxes for the support of the state. In this day of institutional churches and of social service, when our church buildings are open to conventions, institutes, concerts, lectures, and many other worthy things that are not strictly religious, the old tax exemption has been looked at askance here and there by taxing powers, and in California the churches have found themselves classed with taxable organizations because of their varied activities. So the State Church Federation there is now fighting for a new Church Tax Exemption Amendment which is phrased to cover present-day needs. The amendment is as follows: "All buildings, and so much of the real property on which they are situated as may be required for the convenient use and occupation of said buildings, when the same are used solely and exclusively for religious worship, and for social purposes for the benefit of the organized religious body using said property for such purposes, shall be free from taxation. Provided: That no building so used which may be rented for religious purposes and rent received by the owner therefor, shall be exempt from taxation."

ROBERT E. SPEER, in telling of his recent trip through Siam, says: "The regular market day fell on our last day in Tap Teang and we spent the morning there in the corner of the market where the evangelists preached to the people. It was fascinating to watch especially the old men from the country drift by in the throng and stop to listen and then see them caught by some word of truth and sit down on the edge of the platform from which the evangelists spoke. Then as the truth was opened out these old men would begin to nod assent, to express their delight, to ask questions, and they would end by climbing up on the platform and forgetting all other errands as they learned all they could of this new story to take back with them to their villages."

The Marrow of the Gospel

FROM time to time letters reach us that discuss a phase of spiritual experience which is familiar to many new converts. We refer to the recurrence of a doubt of the reality and fulness of the divine forgiveness of past sins, and especially of recent backslidings. Some, who write in agonizing terms, describe the doubts that constantly arise in their hearts, making life miserable. To an inquirer of this unhappy class the Rev. David Smith, one of the best expositors of Bible truth, gives this advice, which we freely pass on for the benefit of others who may be similarly troubled:

"It would make a blessed difference for your friend, it would turn his mourning into dancing, it would loose his sackcloth and gird him with gladness, if he would only grasp that grand truth, the very heart of the Gospel, which I have so often tried to enforce—that God's sacrifice in our Lord Jesus Christ was a full atonement for the sin of the whole world. It is not merely a declaration of his willingness to forgive; it is an abiding testimony that the sin of the whole world has been reckoned with, and forgiveness to the uttermost ensured to every sinner who will receive it. Forgiveness is already ours de jure, and it becomes ours de facto the moment we claim it. The invitation, the command of the Gospel, is not 'Believe, and your sin will be atoned for,' but 'Your sin has been atoned for, therefore believe.' And if you ask how you may know that your sin has been atoned for, the answer is: 'Christ died for all, therefore he died for you; he made atonement for the sin of the whole world, therefore he made atonement for yours. It is possible indeed that you may miss forgiveness; but, if you do, understand the reason. It is not that there was no forgiveness for you, but that forgiveness full and free was yours, and you would not accept it.'

"As Luther put it, 'nothing damns but unbelief.' This is the golden secret of peace, and it avails in every perplexity of the soul. It is the sovereign encouragement of the awakened sinner. It emboldens him to trust and appropriate his blood-bought heritage. And it is no less precious to the backslider. Faith's starting-point is the universal Atonement. Christ died for the sin of the world, therefore he died for me. This emboldens us to make the initial surrender, but too often we introduce a fresh limitation. After our acceptance we relapse into sin, and then we imagine that our original acceptance counts for nothing, and all must begin over again. The mistake here is a too narrow conception of the original transaction. What happened when we first repented and believed? We were assured of our forgiveness; but forgiveness of what? Not of our past sin only, but of every new sin which will ever overtake us. It was the sin of the whole world that was laid on the Saviour long ago. The Atonement covered not only the past, but the future, of humanity; and it covers not only the past, but the future, of every penitent sinner."

This is sound counsel and true, and it should be thoroughly grasped by every believer. God forgives once for all, and if we do our whole duty, and ask his help in our daily lives, he will give us strength and grace to rise after every slip and will not let us be cast down; for he saves "to the uttermost."

The Greatest Sin

WHAT is the greatest sin of all? Many centuries ago a lawyer asked the Great Teacher to name the greatest commandment. People are always interested in finding out the biggest thing. A New York preacher recently sent out a circular letter asking those who received it to mention what they believed to be the greatest sin, that is, the sin most universally indulged in. The vote went to Selfishness.

It will not be hard for all to agree that this answer is true. We may think of other sins that are more horrible but it is impossible to think of any other sin that is more universal. Isaiah sums up the world's transgressions when he says, "We have turned every one to his own way." That is the first manifestation of sin in the tiniest child; that is the last clinging sin of the aged—to desire one's own way, and to have it at the expense of others.

This is the true miracle of Christianity, to take out selfishness and put in love; to take out the desire for one's own way and to instill the desire that God shall have his way and that he shall have it by helping us minister to others.

How woefully has the Church failed to grasp and to meet this worldwide sin! Sacred history has considered that it was a propitious day for the Church when Constantine, after beholding his vision in the sky, emblazoned a Cross upon the banners of the Roman legions with the motto: "In this sign we conquer." Since that time the Cross has been made many times as the symbol of conflict and has been molded into rewards for valorous deeds in battle. To heathen minds it must appear that the Cross almost as much as the Crescent is the sign of strife. But what Christ meant the Cross to signify was the death of selfishness, the death of strife, the birth of love in the soul. The spectacle of Europe's battlefields should lead Christ's followers in America to ponder again humbly and with self-surrender his call to the unselfish life. In home circles, in school circles, in work circles, in church circles we must bow again to his demand for self-surrender and for kindly service.

Jesus answered the lawyer's question by declaring that the greatest commandment is to love. This ratifies the conviction that the greatest sin is not to love. A true vision of Christ's Cross will make the believing heart a sharer in the ineffable love that led him to lay down his life for the sins of the world.

Jews and Armenians

THE war seems to have let loose the brutal passions of the two nations that have long been noted for the violence and inhumanity of their persecutions. In Russia the Jews are suffering incredible hardships. While the Czar's battles are being fought by over 400,000 Jewish soldiers, the families of these loyal troops are being driven from one village to another, robbed, starved, maltreated and subjected to pogroms, as though they were wild beasts. In Anatolia the Turkish treatment of the Armenian Christians has been such as to shock the civilized world, yet no European government raised its voice against it. It was not until our State Department in Washington instructed Ambassador Morgenthau to warn Turkey that the persecution of the Armenians must cease, otherwise our friendly relations could not continue, that a protest was made from any quarter. Just what will be the result of this timely admonition remains to be seen. It may eventuate in permission being granted to the Armenians to leave the Sultan's dominions, in which case we may look forward to an Armenian immigration to the United States even larger than that which followed the massacres of 1896. Turkey is too busy just now with other matters to quarrel with us, and Washington has no desire for a diplomatic rupture. Still, the protest was timely and a necessary step in the interest of humanity. Let us hope it will not pass altogether unheeded.

The Rich Little Girl

SOME time ago there was written an imaginative and charming story of a "Poor Little Rich Girl," about whom the fancy of the author wove an intricate maze of happenings. The whole tended to show that great wealth cannot bring happiness, and may sometimes even be a grievous burden; that it robbed life of its naturalness and made it artificial and monotonous. This pretty piece of fiction doubtless has its counterpart in the world of real people. A case which has some suggestive resemblance to it came up in a New York court lately, when application was made for an allowance of twenty-five thousand dollars a year for the maintenance and education of an orphan girl of sixteen, both of whose parents perished on the Lusitania. This young favorite of fortune is heirless to an estate which yields an annual income of more than $75,000. She has been reared in the lap of luxury, has traveled on the Continent and been accustomed to such surroundings that her guardian feels she should not be deprived of them now. Her fashionable apartment in New York is rented at $6,000, her music and general studies cost $2,500 more, while her maid, house servants, chauffeur, amusements, vacations, doctors, and other incidentals complete the $25,000 allowance asked for.

It would be ungracious to deny this child what is so clearly her own by inheritance, yet it is difficult to escape the contrast between a career so lapped in luxury that it can never have a wish ungratified, and the life of the average young girl who has to struggle and labor with head and hands to make her way in the world, yet who, largely by virtue of that experience, develops into a noble and beautiful womanhood. Who shall say that, after all, the ordeal of facing and conquering hardship is not the better one? The advantages of wealth and refinement may inspire their possessor with the desire to devote her energies and means to some noble purpose; but failing this, her life is apt to become formal and empty. Wealth is only valuable for what it can be utilized to accomplish. To wear it simply as an ornament is like taping the talent up in a napkin. It is not the possession of riches, but what they can be made to do that is worth while, that establishes the value of our hard-ship.

A Sane Warning

MY advice to you is to urge them to keep as far away as possible from the contagion of speculation and especially to warn them against the present fever of speculation." "In some of the most prominent instances the present prices reflect, in my judgment, a fearful wave of wild and senseless speculation that has seized the general public, spreading like wildfire from ocean to ocean, and for which the public will, as usual, pay dearly in the end." "Never in the history of the Stock Exchange has the public been threatened by so dangerous a pitfall as that which is now wide open for its victims."

These sentences are from a letter written by Undermyer, counsel for the government in the money trust investigation, to Rev. C. F. Reisner, who asked the financier to suggest the best advice to be given the public in these days of whirlwind speculation. Mr. Undermyer said further: "It is worse than useless for the average man to expect to amass a fortune or to make money by dealing in the stock market. My experience is that in the end they all lose. They do not lose all the time, but they do lose all in time."

These frank words from one of America's foremost financial experts ought to save many a restless would-be investor from disaster. The extent to which American citizens have forgotten their peace principles and invested in war stocks is appalling. One of the funny men a few weeks ago drew a cartoon of a well-loved citizen reading the paper in his home, with a fearful and anxious expression on his face, and a happy again when he read predictions that war would continue. Peace meant the end of his profits; war meant more gain. It is a ghastly situation that makes an ordinary man keen on reaping private profits from slaughter. Now comes a deep and dignified warning that it is poor business as well as poor morals. It is to be ardently hoped that those whose consciences have been deadened by the lure of the war gold will be awakened by this simple, strong appeal to their common sense.

The Church and the Poor

FROM apostolic times it has been the recognized duty of the Christian Church to take care of its poor. This was a special charge, as was not to be delegated to others, but performed in person. Christ himself gave the example by living as one of the poor, by preaching to them a Gospel of cheer and comfort, and by ministering to their physical necessities. To neglect the poor, therefore, is a palpable inconsistency in one who professes to be a disciple of Him who "went about doing good, and to shut our hearts against the plea of the poor or to despise them because of their misfortune is an evidence of unbelief and an offense against God."

It was possibly with some such thoughts as these in mind that, at a meeting of Presbyterian pastors in New York recently, the Rev. Norman Thomas suggested that the church was without excuse in delegating its almsgiving to either of the two charity organizations in the metropolis. Efforts by these societies to relieve distress had failed miserably, and their methods had proved altogether unsatisfactory. On the other hand, the church, with its widespread organization, which brings it in touch with all classes, can quickly reach and alleviate the needs that may arise among the poor and unemployed within its reach.

There is sound common sense as well as practical Christianity in the suggestion that the church do their own charity work, and that each, within the furthest limits of its parish, hold itself responsible for the welfare of its poor. How much better such plan than to turn them over to some outside organization and then—forget them altogether! Every church should have its relief fund, to which the entire membership can contribute. And, since the actual work is to be done by the members themselves, practically the entire cost of administration would be saved, or else reduced to an almost imperceptible minimum.

The Christian Herald would be glad to hear from the officials or members of any churches that have developed their poor relief work on lines that are proving satisfactory. It would help other churches, both in cities and country districts, to know what the progressive churches are doing in this important branch of religious work.

Pittsburg's Bible School Parade

N EARLY 10,000 members of the Bible classes of Pittsburg churches participated in an automobile parade recently to demonstrate how great an asset for righteousness those classes are. The Allegheny County Sabbath School Association alone are registered 6 adult Bible classes, with a membership of over 20,000. The parade motored in the center of Pittsburg, and in single file passed through the principal streets of the city, crossing a bridge to the north side, then back to the business section, and finally through the east and chief residential section. The line of automobiles was over three miles long. At the close of the parade a mass meeting was held, at which a speaker said: "There are two outlets for the organized energy represented by the Bible classes: Regeneration of the individual members and the development of a community consciousness. Men need regeneration, not mere reformation. The Bible class will therefore fail if it neglects to present to its membership the awfulness of sin and the plan of redemption provided in the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. Every class, therefore, should be composed of men of prayer who have the courage to speak to men concerning the acceptance of Jesus Christ as a personal Saviour. Of all the achievements being made by the adult Bible class army this is the most significant of all. Every class should possess a community consciousness. It should be eager to join hands with other such classes in the city, state and nation. There are enough men in the organized classes of Pennsylvania to lead and grantee state-wide prohibition, to make it impossible for a corrupt administration to remain in power, and to make Pennsylvania in civic righteousness to the nation 'the Keystone State.' There is a difference of opinion as to the lasting value of spectacular parades and demonstrations to the local cause of the building up of the Master's kingdom. But there is no debate as to the permanent, the eternal value of Bible class study to the character of the individual. It is generally admitted that the parade in Pittsburg made for righteousness in the city and set a splendid example to the country at large. The Bible classes are obeying this injunction: 'Search the Scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life; and they are they which testify of me.' (John 5:39.)"

Salt as a Curative

MORE and more modern medical science is recognizing the value of salt and salt water in the curing of wounds. It is learned by experiment that the wounded in the present European war among the sailors make a quicker and surer recovery than those among the soldiers. The fact is attributed largely to the healing effect of the sea water into which they are so often thrown. The medical commission of the British army makes this official recommendation: "In place of antiseptics, then, this commission has recommended as of great value the application to the deep and ugly wounds of what is called a hypertonic solution of salt in water to promote the outflow of lymph. This sets a current flowing from the tissues and saves absorption and retention and cleanses by elimination." What they think the best application is a 5 per cent. solution of common salt. Sea water has 2½ per cent. of salt, and this may be employed to advantage when a stronger solution cannot be obtained. Thus there is the return by science to primitive medication. The preservation and curative power of salt in nature is used as the type of Christianity, as the purifier and cure of the soul and society in these words of the Saviour: "Ye are the salt of the earth." (Matt. 5:13.)

tired old man after sixty-four years of service, and fifty-seven as the pastor of one church, and I have the same message, and the one I have tried to preach all these years." His vision of Christ on the cross and his labors in leading others to that vision are the true secret of his successful life. The minister's message is: "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." (John 1:29.)

After Fifty Years

CLAD in a dress like the one she wore when she entered college fifty years ago, Mrs. Jennie Baker appeared recently in the main building of Vassar College. She told the college officers for thou dost not inquire wisely concerning this." (Eccles. 7:10.)

Ann Arbor's Angell Memorial

THE sixty years of public service rendered by Dr. James B. Angell, President emeritus of the University of Michigan, in education, diplomacy and journalism, are to be crowned by building in his honor a $1,000,000 structure on the campus of the university. No more befitting monument could be constructed than this for the man who, for three score years, gave unselfish service to the education of the young and the betterment of his race. In his intellectual ability, his integrity, his affection, his consecration to the best things, his tireless services in building up individual character and the public good, he is one of the comely figures of American life. The million dollar building will be a material reminder of the more permanent buildings the veteran educator constructed out of right thoughts, pure sentiments, and holy lives. It will also be an inspiration to the students to strive for the highest and holiest things for generations to come. This long life in the pursuit of wisdom receives the reward thus promised: "Exalt her, and she shall promote thee; she shall bring thee to honor when thou dost embrace her." (Prov. 4:8.)

Music From Light

TRADITION has it that 3,000 years ago one of the giant statues on the plains of Egypt emitted beautiful notes when struck by the first rays of the rising sun. Dr. Lee DeForest announced the other day that he had made electric lights play for him music surpassing far the best efforts of the best orchestra. He called it "the music of the lamps." The doctor says that a master musician may sit in his studio in New York and play by wireless "the music of the lamps" into the ear of the Sphinx. For all that is necessary, he claims, is to transmit the electric current to the lamps that give out the music. Dr. DeForest uses for his musical experiments electrical bulbs not over three inches in diameter. If this new discovery shall do what the discoverer claims for it, it will open new gates into the halls of melody to engage the professional musician, and delight the soul of man, and we shall have a new and wholly unexpected reason to rejoice that God said: "Let there be light; and there was light." (Gen. 1:3.)

Aeroplane and Forest Fires

SCIENCE has taken another step forward in fighting forest fires, so destructive to property and life. Mr. L. A. Vilas, using his hydroaeroplane and rising from Big Trout Lake, Wis., 1,000 feet, so that he can see forty miles around him, watches for the first smoke of forest fires and gives the forestry headquarters the signal. Thus the aeroplane has found a new service, and the forest fire a new enemy, and a lesson is drawn in the moral realm from the danger of letting a fire get a start: "Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth." (James 3:5.)

Great New Hell Gate Bridge Span Joined

THERE are so many improvements going on in the line of transportation in New York City, over the water, under the water, and on the land, that commuters and through passengers will realize the value of the new conveniences of travel. The new Hell Gate bridge when completed will finish the last link in the through rail connection from Nova Scotia to Key West, and will open one new gateway to the metropolis for all the residents of New England, as well as a very convenient route for those bound for Washington and the west. The new bridge now under construction is a great piece of engineering in itself, entirely apart from the Olympian plan of which it is an element. The connection with the New Haven system is at East One Hundred and Forty-second Street, in the Borough of the Bronx. A bridge of the "lift" type carries the line across a narrow channel called the Bronx Kill to Randall's Island. From Randall's Island to Ward's Island, over the channel known as Little Hell Gate, there is to be a four-span bridge of the eye-bar truss type. From Ward's Island to Long Island a single cantilever arch now spans the waters of Old Hell Gate, the union of the two out-reaching sections having been joined recently. The span is 1016 feet 10 inches between the faces of the towers, 995 feet between the centers of the bearings. The arch is 140 feet high at the ends and 260 feet high at the center, giving 135 feet clearance in the center at mean high water. The towers are 240 feet high. The width of the bridge between railings will be 93 feet, the width between centers of trusses 60 feet. From the Long Island end of the bridge in Gaynor Park, Astoria, the tracks will reach the Sunnyside Yard over plate girder spans supported on masonry piers, and by a dirt fill retained by concrete walls with arches over the streets. Work was started on Long Island in 1912 and the work will be completed late in 1916 or early in 1917. The ancient Hebrews had no railroads, nor great bridges over great streams, but they had dirt roads for travel and sometimes the public highways that were paved. There is this reference to the construction of a primitive road: "And Achish said, 'Whither have ye made a road today?' And David said, 'Against the south of Judah, and against the south of the Benjaminites, and against the south of the Keathites.'" (1 Sam. 7:10.)

Still "Beholding the Lamb"

THE real secret of the wonderful career of Rev. Dr. John Clifford, the great Baptist preacher of London, has been revealed by a recent incident. A poor boy in a lace factory who showed talent and spiritual power was sent to college by the local Baptists, and for more than a half century he has been one of the acknowledged leaders as a pulpit orator, a moral reformer, and a political progressive. He it was who led the "passive resistance" movement against the Educational Bill of 1902 and roundly denounced the House of Lords for the defeat of the Liberal Educational Bill of 1906. Dr. Clifford a short time ago preached in his old village church at Sawley, saying: "Sixty-four years ago I preached my second trial sermon as a candidate for college from this pulpit. My text on that occasion was, 'Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world.' That was the subject with which I began my ministry. I come to you today as a that when she first registered as a freshman half a century ago she wore a black and white striped hoopskirt, which she made herself. Save for the hoops she had exactly reproduced the dress. Many young girls were surprised to see that the old lady's dress was in the best of present-day fashion. When the alumnae assembled and serenaded Dr. Jarver Monroe Taylor, former president, and Dr. Henry Noble MacCracken, present President of Vassar, many people, especially the older ones, compared the present unfavorably. They never cease to talk about the awful things they do now that they did not do in their time, and grievously lament that the world is going so rapidly to the bad. They are mistaken. The world is much better than it used to be. Despite the awful war there is more intelligence, virtue and practical piety than there was when Mrs. Baker entered Vassar as a freshman. The words of the wise man can be truthfully employed today: "Say not thou, What is the cause that the former days were better than these?

A STRONG new word is gaining currency rapidly. Its newness really consists in the new application of the word to current events. The word is "international." It has taken a prominent place in the language of today through the tremendous reflex action of the war in Europe. The amazement with which a large part of the civilized world beholds this fearful death grapple of hatred between cousin nations and between nations which should be knit together by bonds of international interests, has resulted in the inquiry: Should there be a breaking down of all national frontiers?

And today thoughtful people are beginning to realize that they are a part not only of some one national life, but of world life. The idea is gaining ground that wars will end when national boundaries and national self-interests are not made quite so much of, and when the whole human race is regarded as one. In this wide concept of civic life—a concept which Jesus Christ gave to his followers—it is possible to think of inferior peoples as weaker members of the same body polity who are entitled to and must receive the patient and sympathetic uplifting help of more advanced peoples. Racial antagonisms, national jealousies, and grasping trade rivalries, all such breeders of war are bound to disappear just as rapidly as the true spirit of internationalism spreads among men. For the new idea is in reality only the old fundamental principle in the religion of Jesus Christ. When the angels announced the advent upon this earth of the Son of God, they proclaimed peace on earth among men of good will. Peace is bound to extend itself automatically with the extension of good will among men. And all history is proof that good will follows the flag of Christianity and no other flag through all the races and across all the frontiers of the world. His banner over us is love. The greatest thing in the world is love.

OF COURSE Christian missions from the very beginning have been founded on this spirit of internationalism. And yet even today the Christian Church is far behind its opportunities to carry the banner of Christ to the ends of the earth. We, here in the Christian Herald office, keenly interested as we always have been in the missionary work of the churches, take peculiar satisfaction in the special form of missionary enterprise which is being so generously supported by the Christian Herald Family. The work of providing for and educating almost a thousand Chinese orphans who otherwise, if they outlived the misery of their earliest years, would become plague spots of sin among their fellows, is one of the most valuable of missionary enterprises today. We cannot too often nor too emphatically bring to the minds of our readers the fact that for the most part these children leave the care of the orphanages at a self-reliant age, well equipped for Christian citizenship. They are saved from lives of ignorance and shame and active evil, and transformed into wholesome, intelligent, aggressive Christian young men and young women. This is done at the very minimum of cost. It is done right there on the ground of heathenism. A more direct and effective method of planting the seed of the Kingdom in the soil of China it would be hard to devise.

We quote below a letter received from the Christian Herald Fukien Industrial Homes at Fuchow, China. This is but a sample of many such letters received from the twenty-four orphanages in which the Christian Herald Family is interested. In all, there are now 880 orphans in our care. Their cost is twenty dollars each a year and this covers everything. Many readers have been glad to act as patrons by "adopting" an orphan for support. Many others send regularly lesser amounts asking us to apply them where most needed. We are glad to receive gifts for this splendid work in any amounts. We want every reader to have some part in this missionary enterprise.

They Would Have Become Plague-Spots of Sin

"Fuchow, China, July 1, 1915.

"To the Christian Herald, Bible House, New York:
"Our most respectful and grateful greetings:

"IT IS with deep gratitude we write to thank you for your generous help in establishing our Christian Herald Fukien Industrial Homes. We send you the thanks of the two hundred boys and girls that you have saved from a life of vagabondage and shame, and given them such education as is helping prepare them for usefulness in life.
